A. I get asked this question each year, and it is a good one, but there are a few simple solutions. Eat a lot of fresh fruit and vegetables and drink a lot of water. If you eat matzah, use whole wheat matzah. Try dried fruit – prunes, dates, figs, apples and apricots; drink prune juice or pear juice, if necessary, and try almonds or almond butter as a good source of fibre and a protein rich snack.

Israeli with Canadian connection killed in terror attack

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An 18-year-old yeshiva student who held dual Canadian and Israeli citizenship was one of five teenagers killed by a terrorist last week in the Gaza community of Atzmona.

Asher Markus had just been dropped off at the community's beit midrash (study hall) when a Palestinian gunman linked to Hamas sprayed the hall with rifle fire, according to his uncle, Howard Markus. Asher, who was enrolled in a one-year, pre-army study program, and three other youths who were studying, were killed. Another teenager was killed when a grenade was tossed into his dormitory. Israel responded with massive retaliation.

According to his uncle, Asher spent many summers in Toronto visiting relatives. His Toronto-born father, Yitzchak, moved the family to Israel in 1979 but made sure Asher returned regularly to keep in touch with family members.

Asher visited Toronto about every two years, said Howard, an archivist with Ontario Jewish Archives. "He was very friendly, very easygoing, a bit introverted."

Like any teenager, he loved sports, and when visiting, would often shoot hoops in the driveway with his cousins. He also enjoyed camping in Ontario's provincial parks and was excited about a family train trip to Hudson's Bay.

The news of his death "was quite a shock," Howard said. "This happens almost every day, but you don't really know what to expect. It's different when it hits home and it's personal."

Asher chose to study in Atzmona because it offered the mechinah program, in which teenagers spend one year studying in yeshiva prior to a three-year tour of duty in the army. Prior to that, he studied at the Himelfarb High School in Jerusalem, an institution in the Mizrachi mold, he added.

According to an obituary posted on Israel's Foreign Ministry Web site, on the day before the attack, Asher's mother asked him to remain at home for one more day, but he told her he had to return to his studies.

Delivering the eulogy, Asher's father Yitzchak said his son chose the academy to become a better person. "My son tried to be good at everything. He went to study the Torah, and to be a good Jew," he said.

Asher, who was buried in Jerusalem, is survived by his father, his mother and two brothers.

Arafat confinement officially ended

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Monday after a meeting with Likud ministers the confinement of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to his compound in the West Bank city of Ramallah was at an end, and the Palestinian leader could now move within areas under Palestinian rule.

In the wake of the arrests, Sharon "decided to no longer restrict the movements of Arafat in the territories of the Palestinian Authority [PA]," the Prime Minister's Office said in a statement.

Sharon's foreign policy adviser, Danny Ayalon, said earlier Monday Arafat still requires Israeli approval to travel abroad.

Israel has kept Arafat under effective house arrest since December, and made his release conditional on the arrests of the killers of cabinet minister Rehavam Ze'evi in a Jerusalem hotel last October.

Three suspects were detained by the PA earlier this year, and Majdi Rimawi, the final suspect on Israel's list, was arrested over the weekend.

On Sunday, Sharon acknowledged Rimawi's arrest, saying the roundup fulfilled the conditions for ending Arafat's confinement.

"People have been arrested," he said. "I have said that after they are arrested, we shall let him out of there."

But PA Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo said Monday the Israeli decision had little significance.

"What is needed from the Israeli government is to stop immediately its crimes and massacres against the Palestinian people and to end the closure that all the Palestinian people have been living under for more than 18 months," Abed Rabbo said.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said earlier Monday that he would not rule out a decision to allow Arafat to travel to a scheduled Arab summit at the end of the month, but added there was no reason to make the decision until the conference drew closer.

During the Monday Likud meeting, Public Security Minister Uzi Landau criticized Sharon for his recent about-face on his demand for a week of quiet before negotiating a cease-fire, saying that he did not understand where Sharon was headed.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, the seven far-right National Union-Yisrael Beitenu MKs announced their decision to leave the government. The Knesset faction said its reason to quit was because the government failed to make the decision to topple the Palestinian Authority and "remove Arafat from the area."

Sources in the coalition and the Likud say the now-certain withdrawal of the National Union/Yisrael Beitenu bloc from the government will lead to early elections. Likud sources say the elections will be held no later than early-to mid-2003, about six months before the scheduled October polling day.

Spanish Jews outraged over plan to honour queen who expelled Jews

By HILLEL LANDES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MADRID — Jewish groups are outraged that Spanish bishops have asked Pope John Paul II to canonize Queen Isabella I, who expelled the Jews in 1492 and instituted the Inquisition.

The controversial canonization has essentially been on hold since it was first proposed in the 1950s by a Spanish archbishop.

At a meeting last week, however, the country's bishops voted 60-20 to recommend that the Vatican move ahead with the process for Isabella's beatification, the last step before making her a saint.

Monsignor Juan Jose Asenjo, spokesperson for the Spanish Roman Catholic Church, said the bishops consider Isabella "an exemplary Christian."

He said the recommendation for sainthood should not be seen as an endorsement of her political actions.

Nevertheless, Carlos Schorr, secretary-general of the Federation of Spanish Jewish Communities, condemned the decision.

"As a Jew, I'm not going to interfere with whom the church wants to make a saint," Schorr said. "But I'm surprised that in the 21st century they should want to canonize someone who is known for religious intolerance and all the suffering she caused."

Queen Isabella I and her husband, King Ferdinand, ended seven centuries of Islamic rule in Spain, during which Judaism had its Golden Age, which produced great scholars such as Maimonides and Yehudah Halevi.

The Catholic monarchs gave all Jews the choice of conversion or flight, leading to the infamous expulsion of Spain's Jews in 1492.

They also established the Inquisition, which condemned false converts and heretics to torture and death by burning at the stake.

Schorr thought it was unlikely the Vatican would canonize the queen, but added, "I'm prepared for surprises. After all, they are canonizing Pope Pius IX."

Jewish groups protested the beatification two years ago of the 19th-century Pius IX, who abducted a Jewish boy to be raised as a Christian and was the last pope to confine Jews to the ghetto.

The Vatican has also drawn criticism for canonizing Edith Stein, a Jewish convert to Catholicism who perished at Auschwitz.

Lately, controversy has surged over church plans to canonize Pope Pius XII, who was largely silent about the Nazi genocide against the Jews when he reigned during World War II.

Some non-Jewish Spaniards also protested the bishops' vote.

"Saints are put forward as models for emulation for believing Catholics, of whom there are many in Spain," the left-leaning national newspaper El Pais wrote in an editorial.

However, the paper added, "it is dubious to assert in the 21st century that the good queen who authorized the expulsion of the Jews and the creation of the Inquisition constitutes a paradigm of tolerance and charity."

The bishops' recommendation was also condemned in the independence-minded Basque region. Although Basques are among the most devout and church-going Catholics in the country, many see their history as one of oppression by Spanish kings and dictators.

Martin Garitano, a columnist for the Gara daily in the Basque city of San Sebastian, said, "Catholics should be scandalized" at the prospect of a saint who built a country on an edifice of religious persecution.

Zinni mission eases Cheney trip

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Peace envoy Anthony Zinni's return to the Middle East is seen as an attempt to address mounting international pressure on the Bush administration, and ease this week's Mideast trip by Vice-President Dick Cheney.

After saying that he would not send Zinni back until the number of Palestinian attacks on Israel decreased substantially, President George W. Bush reversed course last week and said Zinni would return to the region, as he was scheduled to do.

Zinni's second mission to the region ended in early January. At that time, he set several conditions for anti-terror action by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, which Arafat has largely ignored.

Yet American officials believe that without some gesture, Cheney's trip to the region – where he plans to discuss the American war on terrorism and a possible attack on Iraq – would have been consumed by Arab calls for American action in the escalating Israeli- Palestinian conflict.

Concern for the Cheney trip "was the key element" in sending Zinni back, said David Makovsky, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Tom Neumann, executive director of the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs, said sending Zinni back to the region eases the pressure on Arafat to control violence.

"Having Zinni return before violence stops is a concession to the terrorism," he said.

A State Department official, however, said that is not the case. "The violence got so out of hand, we wrote ourselves a new parameter for sending Zinni back," the official said. "In sending Zinni right now, we can remove any excuses Arafat may claim for not doing what he must do."

In early December, on Zinni's first visit to the region, Palestinian suicide bombers launched massive attacks on Israel, forcing Zinni to return to the United States. On his second visit, a Palestinian ship was caught transporting tons of weapons and ammunition from Iran.

Some people question what options the Bush administration will have if Zinni again proves ineffective. But other analysts say Zinni is the best, if not the only, choice right now.

Since Zinni was recalled in January, the Bush administration has kept rhetorical pressure on Arafat to curb terrorist attacks as the first step toward a ceasefire.

But knowing that the United States has asked Israel not to harm or overthrow him, Arafat has waited out the Israeli siege in his Ramallah headquarters, and has taken virtually no steps to stop Palestinian violence against Israel.

Instead, his mainstream Fatah faction has carried out virtually all the terror attacks of recent weeks through its Tanzim and Al-Aqsa Brigade militias.

With U.S. activity reduced to verbal salvoes, the spotlight has shifted in the past few weeks to initiatives from the European and Arab states – which are less palatable to Israel.

The United Nations, the European Union and Egypt have called on the United States to get involved, as have U.S. newspaper editorials.

Despite the demands for U.S. action, expectations for Zinni's mission are low.

"The feeling is that stopping things from hemorrhaging is something," Makovsky said, but Zinni also might be able to restart Israeli-Palestinian security co-ordination – nothing more.

Zinni is likely to focus on getting Israel and the Palestinian Authority (P.A.) to go to a work plan laid out by CIA director George Tenet, which is designed to allow for a cooling off period, followed by the Mitchell plan of confidence-building measures leading to a resumption of peace talks.

"The first step toward any political solution has got to be the Tenet plan," Bush said in announcing Zinni's return.

Sharon has said Israel will not begin the Tenet plan until the Palestinians stop their attacks for a week, but he is expected to face intense pressure to drop that demand.

Because the Tenet plan requires various anti-terror steps from Arafat initially, American officials hope the Israeli government will go for it. From Israel, it demands an end to the policy of targeted killings of Palestinian militants and the removal of troops from areas under Palestinian Authority control.

The United States also is expected to urge Israel to use some $225 million in frozen P.A. tax funds to aid the Palestinian economy, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported.

Pressure on Israel has been stronger in the last week, as State Department officials have openly questioned Sharon's tactics.

"If you declare war against the Palestinians thinking that you can solve the problem by seeing how many Palestinians can be killed, I don't know that that leads us anywhere," Secretary of State Colin Powell said March 6 before a House subcommittee.

Since Sharon stated openly that there currently is no diplomatic horizon with the Palestinians, only a military one, dissent has also risen among Israelis, who feel Sharon has failed in his primary responsibility to stop Palestinian terror.

What Can I Do To Help Israel Meet Its Crisis?

Dear Friends:
We all know Israel is currently facing one of the most difficult times in its history.
The crisis is not only political but economic as well.
There are things we in the Diaspora can do to help, including the following:

BUY ISRAELI PRODUCTS

- When shopping for food, look for all the excellent Israeli products in the kosher food section.
- Suggest to managers of your local food stores to develop a "Buy Israeli Products" week.
- Request many great brands of Israeli wine at your neighborhood L.C.B.O.
- Look for the "Made in Israel" label on items like clothing, shoes, beauty products, etc.

CONDUCT BUSINESS WITH ISRAEL

- Buy Israeli stocks on the NYSE and NASDAQ.
- Urge your friends in the high-tech field to explore relationships with Israeli high-tech companies.
- Develop software in Israel.
  Contact: Israel Association of Software Houses
  Fax: 972-3-516-1003
- Subcontract the manufacturing of products in Israel.
  Contact: Israel Investment Promotion Centre
  Fax: 972-2-622-2412

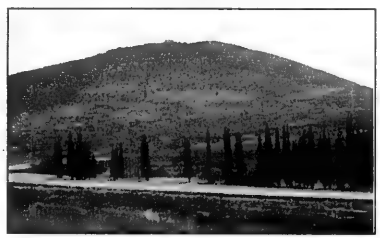
VISIT ISRAEL!

Remember, Israel is so much more than the images we see on T.V. If five million of our fellow Jews can live their daily lives there, we can certainly visit! We must do everything we can to help.

Sincerely,
THE HERCZEG FAMILY

Northern Reflections of a Golden Era

The year is 70 C.E. The Second Temple – the Beit Hamikdash – has fallen to the Romans, who are now determined to rid Jerusalem and the Judean district of Jewish life. By 130 C.E., they've largely succeeded, forcing thousands of Jews north to the upper Galilee and the Golan Heights. Remarkably, Judaism flourishes in these replanted surroundings, where the scholarly rabbis of the Gemara debate the mysteries of Torah. With this brief historical background, you're ready to visit the preserved and restored Talmudic village in Katzrin, capital of the Golan.



Katzrin was among 30 thriving northern centers of rejuvenated Jewish living during the Talmudic era from the third to eighth centuries. Today's tourist village features a typical housing compound, which was both private and public. A characteristic complex would serve an extended family with individual family units leading to a central square. Room allocations were amazingly similar to what we're familiar with today – kitchen, family room and upstairs bedrooms, accessible by a ladder.

On Shabbat, Jews of the Golan would worship in one of 27 synagogues. Seven still-standing pillars support Katzrin's ancient shul – on display today - which functioned for 400 years.

A massive earthquake darkened the golden days of Jewish life in Israel's north, but Katzrin's Talmudic Village, with 90% of its treasures left to be excavated, offers an excellent look at one of Judaism's most spiritually rich periods.

Next week: Wining our way across Israel.

Terror puts U.S. and Israel back on the same page

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israeli armour swept into the northern Gaza Strip in a retaliatory raid last April. Israel launched the intensive operation in retaliation for a Palestinian mortar attack on the Negev town of Sderot, close to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's ranch.

By way of reaction, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell accused Israel of using "excessive and disproportionate" force. He urged Israel to refrain from making further incursions into Palestinian autonomous areas.

Almost one year on, however, the United States all but quietly tolerates Israel's increasingly frequent reprisal raids into Palestinian-controlled sectors of Gaza and the West Bank. In effect, the United States – Israel's closest ally – has virtually given Israel a free hand to respond to Palestinian terrorism, and to maintain its siege of Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat in Ramallah.

"We see eye to eye with the Americans on Arafat and, more than that, on the question of terror everywhere," Israeli Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said after a round of meetings with top U.S. officials in Washington last month.

Although Ben-Eliezer was engaging in hyperbole, he was not far off the mark. Muted U.S. criticism of Israel's raids notwithstanding, Israel and the United States are remarkably in accord on a whole range of Mideast issues.

It was not always so.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 atrocities in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., President George W. Bush leaned on Israel to curb military operations against the Palestinians. Having targeted Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network and its Taliban supporters, Bush sought the backing of Arab states in order to build an international coalition to confront Afghanistan.

Guided by this overarching imperative, Bush adopted a series of calculated measures. He called publicly for a Palestinian state, the first time a U.S. president had done so. He asked special envoy Anthony Zinni to try to defuse the intifadah. He urged Israel to exercise restraint in reacting to Palestinian terrorism.

Once the war in Afghanistan was won, Bush no longer found it quite so necessary to appease Palestinian and Arab opinion and thus rein in Israel's military strikes.

Continuing Palestinian attacks have also drawn Israel and the United States closer. The Bush administration was particularly outraged by Hamas suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Haifa last December, as well as by a subsequent roadside ambush on Jewish settlers near Emmanuel and by the most recent attacks throughout Israel.

In January, the United States was especially upset by the Karine-A affair, in which Israel intercepted a ship, piloted by a PA captain, laden with 50 tons of weapons, munitions and explosives purchased in Iran.

Outraged by the PA's budding alliance with Iran and by Arafat's denial of responsibility for the Karine-A arms shipment – a flagrant breach of the Oslo accords – Bush accused Arafat, whom he has so far refused to meet, of "enhancing terror."

Since then, as Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak learned during a visit to the White House last week, Bush has criticized the PA for failing to halt terrorism and indicated that the Zinni mission will not be reactivated unless the PA dismantles Hamas' and Islamic Jihad's infrastructure and arrests key terrorists on Israel's most-wanted list.

Fierce Israeli counter-strikes on PA buildings and bases and Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank and Gaza have been met with virtual silence in Washington.

Of course, Israel and the United States do not agree on every issue. During his fourth visit to the White House recently, Sharon reportedly asked Bush to sever ties with Arafat, whom he has declared "irrelevant." Bush demurred, but his spokesperson later linked the PA to Iraq, Iran and North Korea, which the administration has called an "axis of evil."

Now that the United States is preparing the ground for a massive military campaign in Iraq, Bush will doubtless request greater restraint from Israel. But since the intifadah has lately escalated by leaps and bounds, it's debatable whether Sharon will be in a co-operative mood.

Chanel's Precision skin care line introduces Radiance Revealing Serum – this special liquid helps to improve micro-circulation that does indeed provide a real spring-time vibrance.

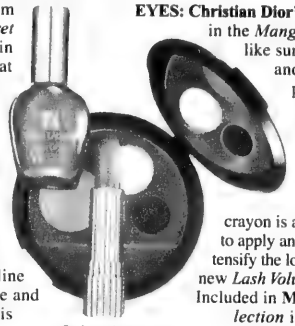
BY CAROL WISE

FOUNDATION: Estee Lauder's So Ingenious is a multi-dimension powder-style foundation. Its quadra-colour technology somewhat redefines foundation as we know it today. With just a flip of the applicator the formula can provide a silky or suede-like finish.

Laura Mercier also introduces a new foundation powder – ideally, it's to be applied with a wet sponge and then through the day you can use it dry for retouching. Another fabulous product from Mercier is her new Secret Finish; this feather-like skin cream is especially handy at the end of the day to add a burst of moisture to your lips and eyes.

Elizabeth Arden introduces Flawless Finish Moisture Makeup – a dream come true for dry skin. It is filled with vitamins and botanicals to drench the skin with moisture.

Shiseido's skin care line creates a fabulous skin care and natural makeup in one. This tinted moisturizer is perfect for the warm spring months.



Orlane's has a brilliant shine.

CHEEKS: Get into your spring mode with Estee Lauder's Floating Colour Collection – so much fun. And for the perfect glow, check out their All-Over Face and Body powder – a must, must have!

Lancaster's Jelly Cheeks are no doubt the cutest of the season. This little transparent blush stick is housed in a little pink package – don't miss it!

Orlane's Velvet Blusher unveils Orange Doré (gilded orange) – a very hot colour and as soft as silk. Be sure to use a great brush for the best application. The tools of the trade do make a difference. Recently I began using Laura Mercier brushes and they are marvelous!

Dust your whole face with Mercier's Shimmer Pressed Powder – it's a gold sparkle that looks great day or night.

For a glossy cheek stain try Shiseido's new creamy cheek tint – perfect for that sun-kissed look.

EYES: Christian Dior's five-colour compact in the Manga Look collection is like sunshine for your eyes, and their Clouds eye pencil is stunning.

Lancome's Kohl pencil in the colour buzz buzz is just too much fun.

Lancaster's crème eye shadow crayon is as soft as velvet, easy to apply and a great traveller. Intensify the look with some of their new Lash Volumizing Mascara.

Included in MAC's Peacenik Collection is a great new shade called Rosemary and Thyme – soft and really nice.

Chanel's Extracils/Super-Curl Lengthening Mascara is designed to lengthen, curl and separate your lashes. It's very rich and velvety in texture. Also from Chanel this season are six sexy eye-shadow shades that will dazzle even the most tired eye. Look at the colours Fluorine and Air.

Lauder seems to have re-invented lash curling with Illusionist Maximum Curling Mascara. It is great and lasts all day.

Long-lasting Fluid Eye Shadow from Orlane is gorgeous in the colour vert clair (light green). It is so easy to apply and has a perfect consistency. Also from Orlane is an interesting eye duo in Warm Tobacco and Green Desert – a very safari kind of look!

LIPS/NAILS : The shade Lolipop is stunning in Lancome's Sheer Magnetic collection. By popular demand, Cargo brings back Waikiki. This golden frost and creamy mocha gloss are a very sexy twosome. The shade Peacenik from MAC is great for that luscious pouty mouth.

Isabella Rossellini features a new high moisture lipstick in some great shades and the mirrored packaging is very smart.

This season, Orlane re-features Cristal Subtil, a wonderful transparent gloss with a crystal-like sheen.

High Shine Lip Gloss from Elizabeth Arden is very shimmery and has great staying power.

Shiseido's translucent clear gloss lipstick is great and is really a sumptuous gloss working undercover in a lipstick container.

Shine up your nails with Dior's Mellow Mauve, or for something different, try Orlane's #37 – a fashionable orange. Both these formulas have brilliant shine and great staying power.

HAIR: Hair this season will continue to be straight, but with a lot more volume and texture, says Terry at the Terry Ritcey Salon (122A Yorkville Ave.). Terry is quite a guy and really dedicated to customer care. His whole staff is exceptionally talented, and if you are planning a special event, make sure you see Mimma for the perfect up-do and Cristina for the best blow dry in the city. Colour brightens your face says Jeff – Ritcey's colour specialist.

The spring favourite will be "panels." This has a peek-a-boo effect that creates brightness, texture, and a freshness that says spring. Terry adds that the new blonde colour will resemble a rice crispy square (beigy pink) and Greg says one length "bobs" are what's hot!

New from Redken is a wonderful Spray Starch that will help you straighten or crimp up your own hair; it has a style memory activated by heat.

FRAGRANCE: Dior's Forever and Ever is beautiful, truly like a fresh bouquet of roses.

This season Marc Jacobs presents body lotion, crème and gel – all like a garden of gardenias.

Ralph Lauren's new purse size Romance is convenient and smells wonderful.

Premier Jour from Nina Ricci is a warm, intimate scent with a note of sugared almond amid a garden of gardenias. Celine for Women is a gorgeous woody/floral scent that is as elegant as it's ready to wear collection and Celine for Men is equally terrific! It is a subtle blend of tradition and boldness.

Givenchy's Pi Fraiche is a subtle version of Pi Givenchy. It is gorgeous with its aromatic herbs and fresh green botanics – perfect for your special guy.

Halston's Unbound Scent for Men is highly spirited and oozes with masculinity.

Hugo Deep Red is the newest fragrance for women from Hugo Boss. Warm, sensual and quite provocative.

Mat by Masaki Matsushima seems to be the scent for celebrities like Madonna. It is a clean and crisp scent with a Zen-like purity.

Heads up: advice for prom perfect hair

News Canada

Wear it up? Wear it curly? Wear it red? Wear it spiked? The stress associated with planning a picture-perfect prom is often heightened by hair style anxiety. Hairstyle trends constantly change, and staying on top of the latest looks is critical to looking one's best on prom night.

Dep offers a guide to this year's latest prom hairstyles – for both girls and guys. All styles should incorporate three elements – simplicity, sexiness and class.

Poker straight

A slick, chic and shiny style obtained when hair is flat-ironed is one of the hottest looks for this prom season. This look combines the 1960s flat-iron style with new-age funk.

To achieve this look, dry hair should be sectioned roughly one inch wide and two inches thick. A gel like New Dep Sport Fragrance-Free gel offers the ultimate in hold required to keep this look. It should then be applied from root to tip, to create a glossy look. Each section should then be flat-ironed so that it is pin straight.

Dep offers the widest selection within the gel category. The product range also includes mousse, a pomade, shampoos and conditioners.

Simple, subtle and sexy

The 'not-so-up' updo is another hot new look for prom, and it is perfect for any hair length. The style is elegant, and can be created in just a few short, easy steps.

To create an updo that is loose and manageable, twist hair with fingers to the base of the scalp, and using bobby pins, hold the twist loosely. Hair should be fanned out at the ends so the style appears natural and funky. A natural hold, lasting the entire evening will result by using new a gel like Dep Botanical Volumizing Gel with Chamomile and Watercress, designed to add volume and strength to hair.

What's old is new again this prom season, as crimping makes a big comeback. The ever popular '80s do is one of this year's most popular styles. Crimping allows for movement and shape without having the fullness associated with curling hair.

The best technique is to first dry hair completely, and then apply a product like Dep Botanical Volumizing Gel with Aloe Vera & Lavendar from root to tip, to ensure the look will last. Then, simply crimp hair.

Male makeover

Simplicity is also the key for males, whether they have short or long hair. Guys should consider either a very short do or a long wispy hairstyle for this year's prom.

Whatever the look you decide on, remember that the most important thing is to enjoy the evening, relax and have fun.

Fashion or faux pas?

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

At CHAT, where the cars are expensive and the coffee comes from Starbucks, one would expect the fashion trends to be ahead of the curve.

This is not the case, however. Students are content, even proud to walk around in ripped sweatpants and hand-me-down sweatshirts.

In many ways, CHAT is not your average school.

In my opinion, it's rare at CHAT to find someone with eclectic style, since most CHATnicks get their style inspiration from the CHATnicks before them.

Students learn early that they should intentionally rip their sweatpants. Their second lesson is to tuck the butchered pants into their wooly socks. Then and only then can they wear their Birkenstock sandals.

"If students want to brainlessly follow this trend, then they show no signs of individuality," says Lisa Glatt, a Grade 11 student.

I guess students can argue that comfort is essential at CHAT, but who are we kidding? The first lesson of fashion etiquette is just the opposite. Comfort is never an issue.

At this age, teenagers want to have friends. Lisa says she would "probably conform to the style of another school to be accepted." At CHAT, most have conformed to looking stupid.

Why, you ask? Why this trend? What does wearing sweatpants tucked into socks do for students?

When I asked one Grade 11 student, she said, "I do it so my pants would get wet in the slush outside." When I asked her how she thought it looked, she replied, "[It] looks good... well, actually, I kinda look like a clown."

Aha! I thought. This student is a perfect example of how drone-like CHATnicks can be.

So, to answer my question, students tuck their sweatpants into their socks not to get them wet.

Right.

When flipping through the pages of Vogue and Vanity Fair, it is not ripped sweatpants that we see. It's stilettos and leg-warmers on the legs of pristine models.

I guess you can say that people following these trends are just as conformist as CHATnicks following their own ridiculous trend, yet it seems to me that if you are following a trend, it should be a stylish one. If following fashion trends turns you into a mindless drone, at least be mindless wearing Diesel and Banana Republic.

Basically, I'm giving a big thumbs down to this ridiculous trend that CHAT has adapted to. To quote Tova Stone, a more individual student, "How are you supposed to know who you are if you're always trying to be someone else?"

Time to shine on Prom Night

With prom just months away, the quest to find the perfect prom dress is in high gear and what makes this season the most exciting in years is the variety of styles that are available.

"This season, grads heading to prom have more choice than ever to find the look that's right for them," said Martina Stathakis, dress buyer for Laura, a division of national retailer Laura Canada.

"While there are some key colours emerging such as coral, lilac, ice blue and pinks from the softest tones to the bold and bright, when it comes to style, individuality is this year's dominant theme."

Nancy Brodeur, a dress buyer for Laura Petites concurs. "Whether you're a romantic at heart, prefer the drama of a sleeky sophisticated gown or lean more toward the avant-garde there is something for everyone this year – Prom 2002 just isn't about one look."

So if your dream is to float into prom in a gown fit for a princess or to make a grand entrance in pure Hollywood style, here are some suggestions from Laura Canada for a prom perfect look.

• For the Romantics at Heart: Pastels are the way to go and this year's offerings have an intensity and depth more akin to a fresh fruit sorbet. Blueberry, raspberry, lilac, pinks, corals and sage head up the list of these dreamy shades, and look fab in princess styled and ballerina inspired ballgowns.

Look for full skirts in layered tulle, glitter tulle or crystal organza teamed with fitted halters, corsets or the season's newest ruched or plissé tops. Subtle details like embroidered flowers and velvet flocking, as well as sprinklings of glitter keep the look fresh and dazzling.

Complete the effect with delicate jewels; a cameo choker fastened with a sheer organza ribbon, a Y necklace enhanced with a dainty flower pendant detailed with frosted stones and crystals, or a fine wire choker with a crystal flower drop, matching earrings and bracelet are definitely the jewels of choice.

And don't forget the perfect cover up! An organza wrap in this year's yummy shades of pink, lilac or ivory is sheer perfection.

• For the Glamour Girls: From chic and sophisticated to 'red carpet' glam, this season offers the 'glamour girl' in you loads of options. Figure flattering sheaths, subtly alluring one-shoulder column gowns, sleek halters, elegant strapless A-line dresses and slinky spaghetti-strap gowns are the key styles to seek, offering plenty of 'wow appeal' from the detail of their cut to their statement making fabrics and colours.

Choose from iridescent satins, gorgeous glitter knits, peau de soie, coloured metallic lace, matte jersey and beaded fabrics.

Hot colours include jet black, white, ivory, navy, hot pink, red, black with white, coral accented with red and ice – the season's newest colour that falls somewhere between white and silver.

Details also make the difference and many of these gowns have great 'exit' appeal with black laced up detailing, dramatic low/open backs, illusion mesh, knot backs, drape backs, ruching and shirring and elegant fishtail hemlines.

To take any of these gowns from great to sensational, add some extra glitz and glam with a coloured cut crystal necklace and matching earrings, chandelier earrings adorned with crystals, or a three-tier crystal drop necklace.

• For the Free Spirit: If you dare to be different and want your gown to exude your individual spirit, then this season won't disappoint! Two piece long skirt sets with midriff-baring tops are one of the season's coolest looks along with lingerie inspired gown, knee to mid-calf length shorter dresses and column gowns with sheer overlays of fabric and pronounced asymmetrical hemlines that begin their descent from high on the knee.

The tuxedo trend has also made its mark and tuxedo touches like satin piping as well as black and white plays of colour provide a new take on prom. Metal cuff bracelets in hot geometric and asymmetric styling also break from tradition along with filigree cut gypsy inspired earrings. And for an extra helping of attitude, why not slip on a pair of this season's newest 'shades' in green, pink, blue or lilac frames to match or contrast with your dress.

News Canada

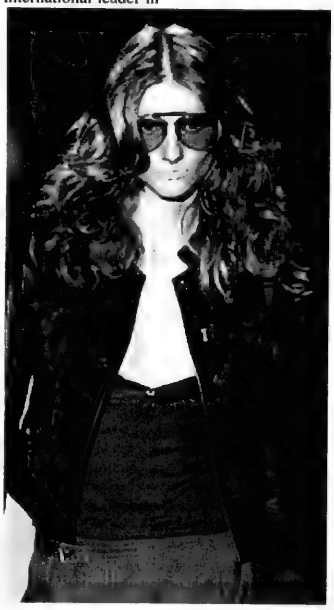
Recognizing the importance of having a hairstyle that is both fashionable and easy to maintain, Schwarzkopf Professional Ltd., an international leader in hair colour and care, has identified this season's "must-have" looks, as seen on the European runways. These looks can be easily maintained at home, even with a busy schedule.

"Spring/Summer 2002 hair trends focus on romance and texture," says Ray Plunkett, director, educational services, Schwarzkopf Professional Ltd.

"Complementing the variety of retro clothing styles popular this season, whether hair is romantic, traditional or avant-garde, it is always very sexy."



Hip hippie-inspired looks:

Hippie-inspired fashions dominated Spring/Summer 2002 runway shows with models showcasing hair styled with "barrel" curls. Flat at the roots, hair cascades in large curls, which form at the shoulders. The flat roots give hair a carefree, "undone" look, a suiting complement to hippie-inspired clothing and accessories.

The colours that best complement the hippie-inspired look are those that mimic the popular shades of the 1970s, but are slightly more muted. Warm honey blondes, caramels with beige tones, soft muted browns and dusty blondes best showcase the Spring/Summer 2002 hippie-cut.

Ringlet romance:

Whether natural or achieved with the help of heated rollers, romantic waves continue to be a dominant hair trend for Spring/Summer 2002. Natural waves can be accentuated by twisting and manipulating the hair with fingers, using styling products such as OSiS Twist curl activator, to hold the shape. To achieve curls with a different effect, pin waves and set in shape with heat. With all looks this season, texture is key. Avoid uniformity by breaking up waves and curls with fingers.

Traditional looks with a twist:

Long hair this season focuses on grown-up sophistication and sexiness. Hair is polished and dressed to perfection, whether simply tied back or styled. The two classic looks that turned heads on the runways this season are the chignon and the bun, two traditional looks that have been updated. The modern-day chignon is parted in the middle, with all length pulled to the base of the nape, braided and then pinned. The ballerina bun is pulled back very tightly off the face into a smooth, sleek bun. Slick back hair with a styling product such as OSiS X-tra Flat flattening balm.

Smooth, subdued colours:

As warm weather approaches, hair colour is light and soft. The preference in Spring/Summer 2002 is overall colour, in contrast to the highlights and sliced sections of colour popular last season.

Interestingly, many top models such as Kate Moss are currently switching from blonde shades to sleek violet browns. Browns with very earthy tones are making a dramatic resurgence, complemented by alternating brown shades to give a "burnt wood" effect. Popular light brown shades include chocolate, caramel and sandy gold.

For those who wish to remain blonde, shades are mellow and muted this season. Soft, warm honey blondes and beige blonde combinations best complement the Spring/Summer 2002 fashion trends.

Artist combines classical past with the present

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibit of works by Russian Canadian artist Zakhar Sherman will be at Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., from March 14 to April 15.

Born in the former Soviet Union in 1950, Sherman lived and studied in Ukraine until 1968, when he moved to Moscow, where he graduated from the art faculty at the Lenin Pedagogical University.

Sherman's first group exhibition was held at Moscow's Centre of the Arts in 1971. Since then, he has presented his works in more than 60 exhibitions in Russia, Poland, Greece, Germany, France, Sweden and Belgium.

In 1990, he immigrated to Israel, where he had solo shows at the Painters & Sculptures Association in Tel Aviv, the Museum of Israel Art in Herzliya, the art museums in Bat-Yam and Ramat Gan.

"My work in Israel started from a political/conceptual form of art – a commentary on the social mood," he says.

Nine years later, Sherman left Israel, where his two sons live and serve in the army, and moved to Toronto "because I have lived and exhibited in cities in Europe and I wanted to come to North America," he says.

In Canada, he has shown at the Illumine exhibition at MEG Gallery in Toronto and at the Art Gallery of Peel in Brampton.

Canada is a "quiet country with a special feeling for art and a good place to live," he says.

Sherman's paintings reflect the classical past, combined with the contemporary imagery and techniques of the last decade. His canvasses echo the seductive shapes and colours of 17th-century Dutch painters such as Jan Vermeer and comment on the myths, symbols and icons of our time.

"I put them into contemporary time – such as Picasso – with my interpretation of Russian classical artists such as Vasaly Perov," says Sherman, who is a member of the Art Society of Canada.

His paintings can be found throughout the world, including at the Museum Ludwig in Colgne, Germany; the Tritiakov National Museum in Moscow; the National Gallery of Novosibirsk in Siberia; the Modern Art Museum in Tampere, Finland; and the City Art Museum in Dresden, Germany.

The Holy Blossom exhibit will showcase 18 of Sherman's paintings, including Exile and The Soldiers, and works of abstract-expressionism.

Marc Salem knew I would write this

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Cynics prepare to be amazed. Marc Salem can read your mind. In fact, he's so confident of his abilities, he offers a $100,000 prize to anyone who can prove there are hidden devices, plants or stooges in his audience.

Marc Salem is reading your mind right now, as you read this story.

Mind Games, Salem's off-Broadway show, runs at Toronto's New Yorker Theatre until March 31.

"I am a sensitive," he said in an interview. "I am able to read and guide people's thoughts."

But, he said, touching on a theme he stresses in his show, "what I do is not supernatural or occult."

For example, during a recent performance I saw, a woman was brought up on stage and handed three colourful envelopes. Two contained coupons for cash gifts and one did not. Salem asked her to pick one envelope. She picked the one without the money. Inside was a note saying he knew she would select it.

Salem thinks he inherited his unique talent from his father, an Orthodox rabbi, who, he said, was also sensitive and very involved in the lives of his congregants. "He was unable to remove himself from people's emotions," Salem said. "He died early at 41 because of this, I believe.

"For this reason, I don't do guidance or give advice," he said.

Instead, Salem chose a career in academia and became a professor of developmental psychology in New York. He has consulted for police departments and has done developmental research for Sesame Street and its Israeli counterpart, Shalom Sesame.

But although he can read minds, be careful what you call him.

"I am uncomfortable with some words," he said. "I don't use 'telepathy,' 'clairvoyance,' or 'precognition,' because they're tinged with belief systems. I am a spiritual person, but that has nothing to do with it."

As an academic, Salem is recognized as an authority on non-verbal communication – what is often called body language. He uses this skill to help police identify liars and to help lawyers during jury selection.

He also uses these skills in his act.

In one sequence, he has five audience members draw something on a piece of cardboard. He then lines the volunteers up and shows them the pictures one by one and asks each person to deny having drawn it. Amazingly, he is able to tell who drew what in every case. It's a lesson in how liars give themselves away.

"Any 10-year-old can do this," Salem said. "A 10-year-old with 30 years practice. Parents, for instance, know when kids are lying. The pitch and speed of their voice changes. There's an obvious indication of discomfort. The only people who can cover up these signs are either pathological or actors."

Salem believes that while half of his abilities are learned, half are inherited. "Anyone can learn to play basketball, but not everyone can be Michael Jordan," he said.

Salem's 90-minute show is highly entertaining – "I use every bad pun in the book" – and suitable for the whole family.

"This is far beyond magic," he said. "The show is the ultimate reality show – it's not rehearsed or directed. It's a very unique kind of theatre. I entertain people and guide them to make choices. They all leave illuminated."

Salem's feats are incredible. One woman was asked to pick a book at random from a bookshelf. He then asked her to randomly pick a page and concentrate on the first word. Salem easily guessed it correctly.

Salem said he's not necessarily reading thoughts in each of his tricks. Rather, he said, sometimes he guides his volunteers to make a certain choice.

In one of his more mind-boggling games at the show I saw, Salem wandered into the crowd and asked three individuals to say a letter – they came up with the combination D-A-K. Then another person chose a city – "Amsterdam." Yet another person picked a time – "6:30" – while another chose "a.m." Finally, one other person selected a snack food: "pretzels." Returning to the stage, Salem pulled out a piece of paper from his wallet with the written words "DAK. Amsterdam. 6:30 a.m. Pretzels."

For the finale, Salem taped loonies to his eyes with surgical tape and then blindfolded himself. He then identified personal items brought to him by members of the audience. At the same time, he was able to identify holiday destinations people were thinking of. "Robert, you're thinking of that trip you took to Paris."

Blindfolded, he also read the serial number off a $5 bill.

Some of his "tricks" may be explained by mathematical probability – although I can't figure out how – but most of his feats are beyond explanation. This show has to be seen to be believed.

And lest you think I've been duped, consider this: During our interview he took my notebook and scribbled something on it. "Think of a two-digit number," he said to me. I chose 28, my "lucky number" since Grade 1. He returned my notebook – and there, in handwriting more legible than my notes, was the number 28. Baffling.

RADIO SERIES RECALLS 'GOLDEN AGE' OF YIDDISH RADIO

Some 1,000 fragile aluminum discs containing recordings from the golden age of Yiddish radio (1930 to 1955) have been rescued from attics, storerooms and even dumpsters, and restored for a special series on NPR, the U.S.-based National Public Radio.

NPR, which has stations in Buffalo that reach into the Toronto area, begins broadcasting the Yiddish Radio Project on All Things Considered, on Tuesday afternoons beginning March 19. The series offers Yiddish and English dramas, music, news programs, advice and game shows, interviews and even commercials that were stalwarts of Yiddish radio.

Translations are performed by a cast that includes Carl Reiner, Eli Wallach and Isaiah Sheffer, as well as Yiddish stars.

For a list of NPR stations, visit the Web site www.npr.org/members. For more about the Yiddish Radio Project, go to www.npr.org.

Jon Simon in Concert: Shaarei Beth El Congregation presents an evening with recording artist Jon Simon, who combines a wide repertoire of Jewish music with a "uniquely beautiful" piano style.

The concert is a fund-raising event for the synagogue. Adults $36, students $18, includes coffee and dessert. A $75 ticket includes a pre-concert reception and preferred seating.

186 Morrison Rd., Oakville. Saturday, March 23, 7:30 p.m. 905-849-6000.

Focus on Chaplin: The Cranbrooke Friendship Club of the United Jewish People's Order presents Ray Rawlings, longtime British labour activist, discussing Charlie Chaplin and the Jewish Connection. Rawlings, whose admiration of Chaplin began the day he saw The Great Dictator 43 years ago, investigates the Jewish influences in Chaplin's work, and traces his family history, his portrayals of Jews, his political views, his friendships and the persecution he suffered as an artist.

March 18, 12:30 p.m. 585 Cranbrooke Ave. $6 includes buffet luncheon.

Pettle's Rising Star: As reported here several weeks ago, the Mirvishes are offering theatre-goers a second chance to see "last season's runaway hit," Zadie's Shoes, written by Adam Pettle and starring his brother Jordan Pettle. The play begins a six-week run in the Winter Garden Theatre on March 23.

Adam Pettle, who is playwright-in-residence at Toronto's CanStage Productions, has been keeping busy. CanStage's artistic producer Martin Bragg recently announced the world premiere of his new play, Sunday Father, scheduled to open next January.

Sunday Father tells the story of Jed, a man who is caught between the past and the present. The play is described as "a funny and touching exploration of family, faith and fortune."

More news of interest from CanStage: next month the company offers a production of Adam Baum and the Jew Movie, which earned playwright Daniel Goldfarb the Oppenheimer Award last season for Best Newcomer to Broadway. The Canadian premiere is directed by Alisa Palmer and stars Richard Greenblatt, Rick Roberts and Dylan Rosenthal. It runs April 11 to May 4 at the Berkeley Theatre, 26 Berkeley St. Tickets $20 to $69. 416-368-3110 or www.canstage.com

Yiddish Night features songs and laughter

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Jews have been thinking out of the box, actor and "philosophe" Harvey Atkin said recently at the 32nd Yiddish night at Temple Sinai.

"Yiddish is a state of mind, which I'll explain by telling stories," Atkin told the audience of more than 400 people.

He told about a dozen jokes, including one about the non-Jew invited to a Jewish golf club, told ahead of time that he should say he was in the shmatte business. When asked in the shower by a member who didn't recognize him, how the beads got into the back of tallesim, he said he didn't know because he only made the sleeves.

Actress and singer Theresa Tova told of how she took the subway for 90 minutes each way every day when she was in New York, in order to be with the 82-year-old Yiddishist-composer, Beyla Schaechter-Gottesman, who spoke to her only in mamaloshen.

Tova sang three new pieces composed by Shaechter-Gottesman, the last of which, Shayn Farendikit zich dos Lidl Funem Tog, the composer wrote after her husband died. Tova helped the audience by providing a translation of the songs in English.

Ben Steinberg, Temple Sinai's composer-in-residence, who chaired the evening, said Tova first appeared at Temple's Yiddish night six years ago.

Her second set of more well-known songs brought the most response, including her Yiddish translation of Brother can you spare a dime, translated by Torontonian Hindy Abelson. Her dramatic style suited this piece particularly well.

Another popular number Tova sang was Mon Shtetl Belz, with accompanist jazz musician Mark Eisenman at the piano.

Other soloists were Lindy Rivers and Judith Miller. Miller was also joined by Joan Dolgin, wife of Temple Rabbi Michael Dolgin, to sing a tango in Ladino, repeated from last year by popular demand. Another Ladino solo was presented by Steinberg.

Jose Shapero directed and accompanied the choir, who led the audience in a highly vocal Shabbes, Shabbes.

Gardens are a peaceful refuge in Rio de Janeiro

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

RIO de JANEIRO — Call it a latter-day Garden of Eden.

The Jardim Botanico, Rio's justly famous botanical garden, is a peaceful refuge in this bustling city, Brazil's playground.

Set between the tropical splendour of Tijuca National Park and the green rugged expanse of the Serra da Carioca mountain range, it rates as one of Rio's top tourist attractions.

In a metropolis renowned for fabulous beaches and a hedonistic lifestyle, one might assume that a 141-hectare park bristling with trees, bushes and flowers would not be of much interest except to nature lovers. Not so.

The garden, founded in 1808 on orders of the now-defunct Brazilian monarchy, is immensely popular, not only with Cariocas (local residents) but also with foreign visitors.

It's not hard to understand its transcendent appeal.

With more than 6,000 varieties of plants and trees representing the vast and fecund panoply of South American flora, the garden is in a class all by itself. No other garden in Latin America can match it.

The path leading inside is breathtakingly beautiful. It is lined on both sides with tall, graceful imperial palms planted nearly 200 years ago. The promenade produces a mesmerizing sensation that causes jaws to drop in spontaneous wonderment.

But this is merely an introduction of things to come.

Take the Vitoria Regia water lily pond, for example. Shimmering on a bright sunny day, it is the very picture of understated beauty and blissful tranquility.

The ceiba, Brazil's equivalent of California's redwood tree – the world's tallest – is usually found in the interior of the great Amazon rainforest, a 1.5-million-square kilometre tract of largely unspoiled wilderness. Rising majestically, its gigantic speckled trunk and rich canopy inspire nothing less than awe.

On this morning, the ceiba was alive with the sound of fluttering wings. A bunch of brightly coloured aracaris, belonging to the toucan family of birds – Brazil's national symbol – were nesting on its broad branches.

The garden is also alive with Brazil trees – whose wood produces charcoal and ink and whose nuts are a delicious treat – and with a variety of other trees whose wood, bark and fruits are put to practical, everyday use.

The resin from the carnauba is converted into floor wax, while cooking oil and cork are extracted from the dende palm and the sobreiro.

Scattered throughout the grounds are rubber and coffee trees, as well as six varieties of palm trees.

Bamboo palms, which form thick groves, grow to huge dimensions. Lipstick palms, whose trunks are partially red, exude a kind of sexuality.

Coconut palms produce a milky liquid and white edible meat, synonymous with the best of Asian cuisine.

Eucalyptus trees, imported from Australia, give off a fresh scent. On a warm day, the uplifting aroma is refreshing.

If you like house plants, you will not be disappointed by the giant philodendron, which can easily fill a large room.

The orchid collection, housed in a muggy greenhouse, is impressive. These elegant, delicate, richly hued blooms are the royalty of flowerhood. Brazil has 2,300 native varieties, some of which, amazingly enough, are used to flavour cakes, candy, sweets and ice cream.

The garden, which is open daily from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., is dotted with graceful Belle époque fountains.

Varig, Brazil's national airline, flies to Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro from La Guardia Airport in New York City.

Miniseries much better on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The recently aired miniseries Uprising, about the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising during World War II, is much better on video than on television.

Unlike the television version, which I found disjointed and unsatisfying, I found the video much more enjoyable without the frequent commercial interruptions. Being able to see it in one sitting also improved the viewing experience.

This is not to say I think the film doesn't have problems. I find David Schwimmer's accent a little hard to take, but overall I think he, Hank Azaria and the rest of the cast have done a good job.

The idea for Uprising came from Disney's studios. Disney (or Miramax, a Disney-owned company), which owns the film rights to Mila 18, Leon Uris's epic novel about the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, asked writer/director Jon Avnet to make a film adaptation of the book. But after a great deal of research and thought, Avnet instead decided to make a film based on the uprising's real events and took the project to another studio.

The story is familiar to anyone who knows Holocaust history. After the Nazis conquered Poland, they moved all the Jews of Warsaw into a small, confined area that became known as the Warsaw Ghetto.

Over the next four years, most of the Jews in the ghetto died of disease, starvation or were deported to death camps. In 1943, the Nazis decided to liquidate the ghetto, but instead of finding the surviving Jews to be meek and acquiescent, they ran into the armed resistance of the Jewish Fighting Organization. From April 19 to May 16, 1943, the Jews fought a battle, and though it was ultimately unsuccessful in defeating the Nazis, it inflicted a great deal of damage and allowed hundreds of Polish Jews to escape. The film concentrates on two of the resistance leaders, Mordechai Anielewicz (Azaria) and Yitzhak (Antek) Zuckerman (Schwimmer).

In the seven years Uprising took to make, Avnet became very passionate about the film.

"The people whose story it is aren't alive to tell it," he says. "It's been 58 years since the uprising and no one has told the story."

While it's true that most of the participants, including Anielewicz, died in the uprising, this is not the first film to tell the story.

In 1948, Alexander Ford made a Polish film, Border Street which covered much of the same ground. The television miniseries Holocaust and the 1984 film War and Love also contained sections describing the uprising.

But Uprising is probably the biggest and most expensive film and the only one to focus exclusively on the Jewish resistance. While the second half of Uprising is much better and more riveting than the first part, overall, the film provides a good summary of the events and is a valuable addition to the genre of Holocaust films.

Uprising is now available for rent and for sale on VHS and DVD at most video stores. The DVD version contains two documentaries about the making of the film and about the survivors.

Rhythmic gymnast wins club tournament

Gold medal in her age group's level 10 category

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Julia Gurau loves gymnastics and apparently gymnastic judges love her too. At a recent invitational tournament hosted by her home club, Gurau won a gold medal in her age group's level 10 category.

Gurau, 14, finished first in ribbon, and second in both hoops and ball disciplines to assure herself of victory in the Toronto Aspirals Rhythmic Gymnastics Centre's Valentine Classic.

The centre's top senior level 10 competitor, the highest provincial designation, Gurau defeated girls from 10 visiting clubs to claim the medal.

Many of the opposing clubs produce provincial-level gymnasts, said Sima Studin, president and manager of Toronto Aspirals. Gurau, she said, has the grace, elegance and technical skills to make her a top performer.

She has excelled at her sport for several years. In 1999, she won a bronze medal in the provincial championships at level 3. Last year, at the club's first annual Valentine Classic, she finished second.

Gurau "is an extremely charismatic performer," Studin said. "She captures the hearts of the audience and judges.

"She projects a lot of energy from within. She's good technically and she is an extremely hard worker."

Gurau was trained by Anjelika Ternovsky, a veteran coach who has worked with athletes in Russia, Israel and Canada. A Grade 9 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Gurau has been training in rhythmic gymnastics since she was seven years old.

She had tried classes in dance and ballet, but loved rhythmic gymnastics from the start, Gurau said.

What's more, "I love my coach. I love the competition and the feeling you get, the satisfaction if you've done well, that the hard work paid off."

Gurau is dedicated to her sport, training nine to 12 hours per week, while making sure her studies don't suffer. Her favourite event is ribbon. "I really enjoy it. It's graceful and fun to work with," she said.

More than 110 competitors participated in the Valentine Classic, which was timed to coincide with "I Love Gymnastics" week, a special awareness program sponsored by the Ontario Gymnastics Federation.

UEFA moves soccer game from Israel over terror fears

By ELI SHVIDLER
Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Despite frantic last-minute representations by a high-level Israeli delegation last week, European soccer's governing body refused to change its decision to move an important UEFA Cup match from Hapoel Tel Aviv's home grounds. Hapoel had been scheduled to host AC Milan on March 14 in the first leg of a home-and-home affair.

The UEFA decision last week followed the terrorist attack on the Sea Food restaurant in Tel Aviv where two Hapoel players, Yossi Abuksis and Assi Domb, were dining when the gunman struck. Both men escaped unscathed.

The European body said that with the terrorists hitting so close to where AC Milan would be staying and playing, it could not allow the team, or any other foreign team in any competition, to travel to Israel in the foreseeable future.

Sports Minister Matan Vilnai led a delegation to Geneva to try to persuade UEFA chief executive Gerhard Aigner that he would personally vouch for the safety of the team. Vilnai was accompanied by Rafi Agiv of Hapoel Tel Aviv and other officials, but Aigner was unmoved.

"We have listened to the delegation and the minister and we haven't heard anything we haven't heard before," Aigner said. "Nothing has changed and there are no new elements. They [the Israeli authorities] gave us their arguments about why the match should be played in Israel, but we stand by [the] decision, which was final."

The ruling means the UEFA Cup quarter-final match will have to be played at a neutral venue, possibly Cyprus.

'Capitulating to terrorists'

"We appreciate them seeing us, but we're disappointed the decision has not been changed," Vilnai said. "The government of Israel can guarantee that every team that comes to our country is safe and no player will ever be harmed."

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres both spoke to Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who is also president of AC Milan, in a bid to convince the Italian side the game should go on as originally scheduled.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said UEFA's decision was wrong and dangerous, saying imposing a ban meant "capitulating to terrorists."

Berlusconi told Sharon in a phone conversation that Italian team AC Milan wanted to play in Israel and added he would do all he could to reverse the decision.

Meanwhile, the military wing of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah organization, the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, announced prior to UEFA's final decision that if the soccer body reversed itself, the organization would carry out an attack "in connection to the game."

כל התקוות, מחשבות על זהות ישראלית מאת: עמוס עוז

"מדינת ישראל היא בעצם לא מדינה, לא חברה, לא עם - היא אוסף של נימוקים" כותב עמוס עוז. הנימוקים הללו מתעצמים והשסע בזהות הישראלית מתחדד; שמאל וימין, חרדים וחילוניים, מזרחיים ואשכנזים. אבל אומר עוז, יש במתחים האלה משהו פורה; פה בארץ חמדת אבות כל פלגי הציונות. הימין צודק בחלק מהחרדות הקיומיות אך הימין לא צודק במסקנות המוצעות. הימין גם סובל ממה שעוז מכנה "ציוויליזציה של לא יעלה על הדעת". כדוגמת לא יעלה על הדעת שבארץ ישראל, נחלת אבותינו לא נוכל לנוע בחופשיות בכל מקום. אך זו המציאות; אין אנו יכולים לנוע לגמרי בחופשיות בנחלת אבותינו וכדאי שזה כן יעלה על הדעת. השמאל לעומת זאת טועה ב"סכמטיות צדקנית" שרואה את הפלסטינים כקורבנות ואותנו כרעים ממערבון פרוע. זוהי עמדה שמתעלמת מהקואות המרושעת שבתנועה הלאומית הפלסטינית שהטביעה את כולנו, ערבים ויהודים בנחלי דם.

About Food

During Passover, it is forbidden to eat chametz (leavened products) containing wheat, barley, oats, rye or spelt. Ashkenazi (European) Jews do not eat kitniyot (beans, peas, lentils, corn, rice or soy products.) Many Sephardi Jews eat legumes and rice, but only after checking them grain by grain to be sure they contain no foreign materials. Some Jews will not eat "gebrocks;" i.e., foods containing matzah and its derivatives (cake meal, matzah meal, farfel) that are combined with liquid. Fresh fruits, herbs and most vegetables are kosher for Passover. Here are two easy vegetarian dishes that everyone can enjoy!

Helene Feldman of Toronto shared this luscious recipe with me which she adapted from The Barefoot Contessa by Ina Garten. Helene adds more eggplant, red pepper and onion. This makes a larger quantity and reduces the amount of fat per serving.

ROASTED EGGPLANT SPREAD, HELENE'S WAY

2 medium eggplants, peeled
3 red bell peppers, seeded
1 large or 2 medium red onions, peeled
2 garlic cloves, minced
3 tbsp. good-quality olive oil
1½ tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 tbsp. tomato paste

Preheat oven to 400. Cut eggplant, bell peppers and onions into 1-inch cubes. Toss them in a large bowl with garlic, olive oil, salt and pepper. Spread them on a baking sheet. Roast for 45 minutes, until the vegetables are lightly browned and soft, tossing once during cooking. Cool slightly.

Place the vegetables in a food processor fitted with steel blade; add tomato paste and pulse 3 or 4 times to blend. Taste for salt and pepper. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

Diane Plant, a Toronto real estate agent, plans to serve this easy, elegant side dish at her Passover seder. This colourful dish goes well with roast chicken or turkey. This recipe comes from The Complete Passover Cookbook by Frances R. Avrutick. Enjoy.

DIANE'S PEACH POTATO PUFFS

2 cups mashed sweet potatoes
1 tsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. brown sugar
¼ tsp. salt
dash of ginger
2 tbsp. margarine, softened
6 canned peach halves
margarine

Preheat oven to 400. In a medium-sized bowl, combine the sweet potatoes, lemon juice, brown sugar, salt, dash of ginger and margarine. Whip until fluffy. Pile some of potato mixture into each peach half. Arrange the filled peach halves in a greased 6 x 10-inch baking pan. Dot with additional margarine. Bake for 20 minutes. Makes 6 servings.

Mount Sinai Hospital Scientists continue to be recognized as scientific leaders

Mount Sinai Hospital Scientists continue to make important and exciting contributions to health research, furthering the international reputation of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute (SLRI) as one of the world's preeminent centres for biomedical research. Three recent publications in prestigious international journals highlight the innovative research being conducted at the Lunenfeld in the exciting fields of proteomics and bioinformatics.

Lunenfeld investigators Drs. Tony Pawson and Mike Tyers have identified a way in which our cells are regulated when genetic material (DNA) is duplicated. This work, published in the November 2001 issue of Nature, describes how a protein can create an on-off switch in the cell, essentially telling the cell to replicate or not to replicate its DNA. "Malfunctioning of master switches is implicated in cancer", explains Dr. Pawson. "And these findings shed new light on the circuitry that these switches control."

A second paper published in Nature (January 2002) highlights an exciting discovery of how proteins are assembled. In collaboration with MDS Proteomics, SLRI Investigators Drs. Hogue, Pawson, Durocher, and Tyers have used a free public database called BIND (created at the Lunenfeld by Dr. Hogue and Gary Bader) to identify how molecules interact with one another. Understanding these interactions will ultimately result in new drug targets to fight human diseases such as cancer.

Work in the laboratories of Drs. Pawson and Sicheri by graduate student Leanne Wybenga-Groot was recently published in the journal Cell. The article describes the exciting discovery of solving the structure of a protein, called EphB2, a molecule that is known to be active in colon cancer. This work revealed how a particular part of the EphB2 protein, called the juxtamembrane region, is responsible for turning the protein on or off. This discovery may lead to new drug targets that would 'turn off' the EphB2 protein in diseases known to have high activity, such as colon cancer.

"Publication in these high quality journals is a testament to the excellence of the science being undertaken at the SLRI", says Dr. Stephen Lye, Acting Director. "We should all be proud of these outstanding achievements."

Prayer vigil in Jerusalem

A special day of prayer and fast on behalf of Israel was declared last week for Jews around the world. At the Kotel in Jerusalem, chief rabbis Yisrael Meir Lau, right, and Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, beside him, led the prayers. Rabbi Lau's prayer began: "Master of the Universe... gaze down from heaven and see the victims of burning hatred in Your world, hear the cry of those hurt by terror wherever they may be, visit Your mercy upon those who have lost their loved ones who have risen to the heavens in a fiery storm of loathing, abhorrence and hatred which threatens the peace of the world and its inhabitants." Please see related story on page 5. [Israel photo]

Canada's foreign minister heading to Middle East

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Fresh from his speech this month before the annual Canada-Israel Committee policy conference, where he rebuked Israel for "compromising" its image in the current Mideast turmoil, Foreign Affairs Bill Graham is planning a trip to the Middle East, including Israel.

The CJN learned last week that Graham is planning a Middle East swing through several countries some time next month.

"We're still looking at dates. There's no precise itinerary," Foreign Affairs spokesperson Carl Schwenger told The CJN. "It's still being worked on." But if the trip is on, Graham will definitely go to Israel and the Palestinian areas, Schwenger said.

With this trip, the cabinet minister, who was appointed in January, would make the Middle East high on his agenda. So far, Graham has made official visits to the United States, Europe and Mexico.

"I welcome it," remarked CIC national chair Joseph Wilder, who had defended Israel before the media following Graham's speech to the policy luncheon. "I see it as a fact-finding mission and to get acquainted."

The trip should be fairly "typical and predictable," said CIC national executive director Shimon Fogel. "He's anxious to go and get a direct handle on what's going on."

The News In Brief

CANADA

Web Myth Debunked

TORONTO — A trio of Jewish groups is debunking an Internet myth that claimed Fuji Heavy Industries Ltd. was distributing a world map that ignored Israel. The Internet story called on readers to boycott Fuji film and its automotive division, which produces Subaru cars. Canadian Jewish Congress reported that the U.S.-based Jewish Council for Public Affairs and the Anti-Defamation League determined that Fuji did not publish or distribute the map in question. Furthermore, the Internet letter confused Fuji Heavy Industries and the film producer, which are two separate companies.

ISRAEL

Wedding Hall Tragedy

JERUSALEM — A panel investigating last year's wedding hall collapse here has recommended compensation for the families of the 23 people killed in the disaster. The panel recommended a one-time payment of about $17,400 (US) to each family and about $21,700 for families that lost more than one member. The recommendations must be approved by a parliamentary committee. Along with the 23 killed, more than 200 were injured when a dance floor in the hall collapsed onto floors below. The builders and owners of the hall received jail terms after it was determined that shoddy construction methods were at fault.

Nazi Comparison

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has claimed that Israel tattooed numbers on the arms of Palestinians the army rounded up in refugee camps. "Is that not what they say the Nazis did to the Jews?" Arafat told Abu Dhabi television. The army denied the allegation, saying Palestinians detained in Tulkarm had been given numbers to facilitate their questioning, but that these were written on their arms in ink that would wash off.

Jewish Scientists Unite

JERUSALEM — A new group wants to promote scientific research on issues affecting world Jewry and Israel. The World Congress of Jewish Scientists hopes to encourage interdisciplinary initiatives in genetics, energy, water studies and computer science. The group, which is forming in Israel this week, wants to hold master classes for top scientists and create a museum highlighting the contributions of Jewish scientists. The Jewish Agency for Israel is behind the group's formation.

WORLD

Farrakhan Ban

LONDON — British officials are seeking to maintain a ban preventing Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan from entering the country. The officials claimed before an appeals court last week that a Farrakhan visit could stir up racial tension. Farrakhan was banned in 1986 after Britain said he had expressed views that were racist and anti-Semitic. But last July, the ban was overturned by London's High Court.

Bulgarians Remember

SOFIA — Bulgarian President Georgi Parvanov joined hundreds of Jews here last week to commemorate the refusal of the citizens to send Jews to the Nazi death camps. The event marked the 59th anniversary of the day when ordinary Bulgarians, led by politicians and clergy, protested and effectively prevented the deportation of some 8,500 Jews who had been rounded up by Germans in the city of Plovdiv.

Cantor Charged

NEW YORK — A local cantor turned himself in last week to face charges that he sexually molested his nephew. Howard Nevison of Temple Emanu-El is accused of abusing his nephew at least three times during visits to the boy's Philadelphia home. A judge is slated to hear preliminary evidence this week. Nevison's lawyers say he plans to contest the charges.

McSettlement

NEW YORK — Some kosher groups may receive money from McDonald's Restaurants as part of an apology from the American fast food company for not disclosing that it used beef tallow in its french-fry oil. The main recipients of the reported $10 million (US) settlement will be groups representing vegetarians. Children's nutrition groups, as well as those representing Hindus and Sikhs, will also receive some of the money.

Former Mayor Dead

CAPE TOWN — A former mayor of Johannesburg who was active in the Jewish community was found dead March 7 in a hotel room on the outskirts of the city. David Neppe is believed to have committed suicide, police said. Neppe, 56, succeeded his father, Max, as mayor of Johannesburg.

New Group Formed

MOSCOW — A new group has been formed to represent Jews in the former Soviet Union, Asia and Australia. The group, known as the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress, is affiliated with the World Jewish Congress. Alexander Mashkevich, a Kazakh billionaire, is the new group's president.

Cotler's Counter-terror Principles

OTTAWA — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler rose in the House of Commons last week on the six-month anniversary of Sept. 11 to "recall and reaffirm" the principles of counter-terrorism law and policy. Cotler's six principles are:

- "Terrorism can never be justified;"
- "The transnational networks of super-terrorists – with access to weapons of mass destruction – constitute an existential threat to the right to life, liberty and the security of the person;"
- "Freedom from acts of terror – freedom from fear of terror – constitute a cornerstone of human security. In the words of the prime minister, 'there is nothing in our experience that can capture the fear that Israelis live with every hour of every day;'"
- "There can be no moral equivalence or similitude between terrorism and counter-terrorism – between deliberate acts of terror against civilians, and acts of self-defense against terrorists;"
- "Support and sanctuary for groups responsible for terrorism, as the foreign minister put it, is 'unacceptable;' "
- "Counter-terrorism must always comport with human rights and humanitarian norms."

Community pitches in to help Anshei Minsk

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The stale, musty odour of burned wood mixed with wet paper and aged book bindings strikes you as you descend into the basement of the Anshei Minsk Synagogue.

Books and individual pages lie strewn in boxes, placed there after they were collected from the synagogue's front steps, where they had been left by firefighters trying to save them from an early-morning fire on March 11.

As you climb the stairs to the shul's upper balcony, where an unknown arsonist set boxes of the holy books alight, the sharp smell of a wood fire becomes dominant.

The books had been stored in boxes below and on top of wooden pews in the shul's upper section, on the south side of the building facing St. Andrew Street in Kensington Market.

The benches are charred black and the wall and ceiling above are discoloured from fire and smoke damage. Initial estimates of the damage were conservatively put at $100,000, but Rabbi Shmuel Spero, the shul's spiritual leader, believes it's much more. And, he said, it could have been far worse.

A fire officer speculated that had the fire been set the night before, when strong winds ripped through the city, or had the fire burned for another 15 minutes before emergency services were notified, the blaze might have spread to the roof and caused it to collapse onto the sanctuary below. If that had happened, the damage would have been massive.

Congress spokesperson Len Rudner and Rabbi Spero said it appears the perpetrator entered the building on the upper, balcony level through a fire escape.

Det. James Hogan of the police Hate Crime Unit, said District 14 police investigators inspected the premises looking for clues as to the perpetrator's motivation.

They found nothing to indicate it was anything more than a simple break and enter and arson. "We're not treating it as a hate crime," Hogan said. "There is no indication of a hate motivation. There is no graffiti, no desecration, no messages."

Two new Haggadot

The Encyclopedia Judaica records, "Since the 15th century, the Haggadah has had more than 2,700 editions, either with or without commentaries.

"Through the generations, the Passover Haggadah has been one of the most popular works – perhaps the most popular – in Jewish religious literature."

Since the encyclopedia was published in 1973, hundreds more editions of the Haggadah have probably appeared. With Passover less than a week away, I bring to readers' attention two new Haggadot that recently came across my desk.

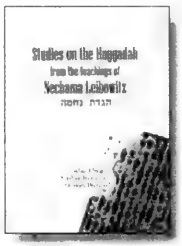
The Hagadat Nechama: Studies on the Haggadah from the Teachings of Nechama Leibowitz, edited by Rabbis Yitshak Reiner and Shmuel Peerless, is a special treasure.



Nechama Leibowitz was one of the most beloved, most revered, most widely influential Torah scholars and teachers of the past century.

Born in Latvia in 1905, she moved to Israel in her mid-20s; she lived there – never departing – until her death in 1997. Her students number in the thousands and have themselves perpetuated their teacher's teachings and approach to Torah study specifically and to pedagogy generally throughout the world.

Leibowitz's teaching style, perhaps best described as aggressive Socratic, was based on the principle of "active learning," as the editors of this Haggadah termed it. She had deep respect for her students, who hailed from every walk and stratum of life. She challenged them to dig ever deeper into the text, to probe past the surface, to awaken a quiescent curiosity in the life-affirming search for greater personal meaning and insight into the Torah's Divine instruction.

For more than 30 years, Leibowitz prepared weekly gilyonot, study sheets, on the weekly Torah portion. Rabbis Reiner and Peerless have collected, from Leibowitz's gilyonot and from some of her other writings, questions relating to the narratives in the Passover seder, organizing the material according to the prescribed formula of the seder.

The editors provide readers with Leibowitz's commentary, her questions and even some suggested answers through to the Maggid portion of the seder, that is, until the start of the festive meal.

The last entry of commentary before the meal is typical of the level of the discussion throughout the Haggadah.

"The performance of the seder, including the engaging [in] discussion and analysis of the Exodus, is designed to have us relive the liberation from Egypt annually. This experience engenders both an ethical imperative and a theological imperative. Nechama related to both in her studies in Shemot."

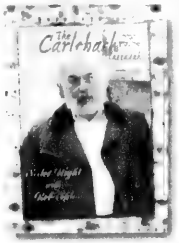
The editors then provide examples of both these imperatives and conclude their commentary with these lofty notions, the last ones on the page.

Like a key that unlocks the door to a room of buried treasure, Hagadat Nechama enables the reader to touch, as if holding in her hand, newer, more shining and beautiful jewels of understanding into the paradigmatic learning experience we call the Passover seder.

The Carlebach Haggadah: Seder Night with Reb Shlomo by Yitz R., C. Stefansky and Chesed LiShlomo Foundation provides a totally different Pesach experience.

Whereas Leibowitz's Haggadah challenges the mind, Carlebach's Haggadah stirs the emotions.

As described on the Haggadah's jacket cover, "The editors, veteran yeshiva students and disciples of Reb Shlomo... devoted great effort into collecting teachings, thoughts and stories from live recordings and first hand recollections... drawn from Reb Shlomo's concerts, shiurim, mass kumsitz sessions and his holiday celebrations over the course of many years."



The annotations, arranged thematically, according to the corresponding subject in the order of the seder, are anecdotes and mashals, homilies, recounted in the signature style of Reb Shlomo, that of a Chassid – and in his unique case, with a hauntingly evocative sense of music and passion – spinning morality folk yarns. The stories reach the heart.

But less than elaborating upon the text of the seder, Carlebach's Haggadah helps to achieve an atmosphere for the retelling – and reliving – of the Exodus.

Both Haggadot are published by Urim Publications. Their Web site is: www.UrimPublications.com.

TRANS-GENERATIONAL GENEROSITY; Shira Lipner's Grade 1 students at Associated Hebrew Schools recently made more than 100 packages of food and snacks to give to her husband, Rabbi Rafi Lipner, who, together with his students at CHAT, delivered them to seniors at Baycrest Terrace.

Budget cuts seen hurting home care for seniors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Daphne Doak is frustrated and angry and doesn't know what to do about it.

The vice-president of client services at Circle of Care said she feels helpless as she watches clients at her agency, among the largest providers of home-care services in the province, have their home care drastically cut.

"These people have little choice. They either live at risk in their own home, or they have to consider a nursing home," says Doak.

Services have been cut, she said, since community care access centres (CCACs) – set up by the province about six years ago to provide information and referral, case management, in-home services and placement co-ordination – were no longer allowed to run a deficit.

"To stay within their budget, which just doesn't accommodate the rising cost in services year after year, [the CCACs] had to make cuts."

Services affected include nursing care, provision of medical equipment, and personal support and homemaking.

Sonia Ranieri, manager of home support services at Circle of Care, said people are forced to depend on their family, or they "fall through the cracks. Once we lose track of them, they are no longer part of home care."

She said if clients "don't speak English and they don't understand the system, then their needs will not be met."

CCACs have "a certain pot of money, and they have had to make difficult decisions in order to reach the maximum number of people."

To lobby for increased funding, a multicultural coalition was recently formed by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and includes such groups as the Italian National Congress, the Portuguese Congress, the Armenian community, the Hellenic community, the Islamic Society of North America and the Catholic Church.

Called Communities for Home Health Care, the coalition recently held a forum at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living to allow seniors and caregivers to voice their concerns.

The coalition wants the province to restore a 1998 commitment to increase its annual home health care expenditures by $550 million, to be phased in over six years. Increases to the home-care budget have been frozen at $275 million.

Leslie Siegal, Circle of Care's home support co-ordinator, said in an interview that she sees many people who "sit alone day after day in their apartment. This is what happens when home care is cut."

Helen Friedman (not her real name), 82, a client of Circle of Care, has not left her apartment in two years because she has vertigo and is afraid of falling.

In the past several months, Friedman said, her home care has been cut from seven hours a week to one hour.

"It was a gradual reduction. Each week I would lose a day. Before, someone would come in every morning and help me get up. I would get a shower twice a week."

Her children visit her and bring her food, she says, and her son comes to put her to sleep at night "but they are working and they're busy.

"When someone came every day, I had a visit. I had something to look forward to. It was a positive way to get my day started. Now, I wake up alone, and I'm alone most of the day."

Friedman, who came from Russia 27 years ago, said she does not blame the workers. "It is the government; it has cut and cut and cut, and seniors are suffering. When I came from Russia, I kissed Canadian ground. Now, things are looking down."

Michael Scheinert, president and CEO of Circle of Care, told the Betel Centre forum that home care, which has a labour force that consists of 99 per cent women, is an industry that is "predominantly without a voice. There is no powerful board of directors; there are no spokespeople, there is no glitz or high-level technology, and there are no huge buildings.

"It barely registers on the Richter scale," Scheinert said.

Paula Mintzberg, at-home respite care program co-ordinator at the Betel Centre and a registered nurse with experience in private duty and palliative-care nursing, asked people to imagine spending $30 for a nap. "That's what some caregivers have to spend in order to get some respite care."

More than four years ago, she said, the Betel Centre established her program in order to provide respite care for senior caregivers.

"Since then, the need has become greater. Some clients who had been entitled to four hours a week of home care have been cut back to 45 minutes a week. Through the volunteer program, we have been able to brighten the lives of many people."

Doak said, however, that depending on volunteers is a "bandage solution."

Ranieri said it is also frustrating for the home care workers. "Many stay beyond their time, but that is unauthorized time. There is a lot of worker dissatisfaction, because they can only do so much."

From her perspective, Ranieri said, co-ordinating the workers is a scheduling nightmare because they spend only one hour with each client.

Community prays for peace in Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Black hats mixed with the knitted kippot of Mizrachi as nearly 800 men and women came together last week at Torath Emeth congregation to pray for peace in Israel.

The event was part of a worldwide voluntary fast and Yom Kippur Katan commemoration called by the chief rabbinate of Israel. It was followed by a number of rabbinical associations, including the Vaad Harabanim of Greater Toronto, several in the United States and the chief rabbinate of Great Britain.

The day before every rosh chodesh is considered Yom Kippur Katan, literally, the small Yom Kippur. Through the ages, it has been considered a day of prayer and, often, fasting.

The Israeli chief rabbinate thought it would be a good opportunity for Jews all over the world to come together to fast and pray to God for peace.

Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, spiritual leader of Torath Emeth, said Jews have always sought refuge in God from the terrible things that have befallen them. Our vengeance, including what is happening in Israel now, is not in shedding blood, he said. Rather, "prayer, mitzvot and good deeds will impel God to make His glory known through the world.

"That is our vengeance."

He called the service an opportunity for everyone to take personal stock of themselves, "especially in what comes out of our mouths. We must sanctify our instrument of communication."

Through services such as the one in Toronto and others on the same day elsewhere the world, including at the Kotel in Jerusalem, "our combined words will pierce the heavens," Rabbi Ochs said.

In addition to the regular Minchah and Maariv services, psalms were recited, as was a Torah portion that is traditionally read on a communal fast day. The service ended with Selichot, prayers asking for God's help and compassion.

Mizrachi executive director Jerry Tepperman said he was encouraged to see so many young people at the service, including some from Bais Yaakov and Tiferet Bais Yaakov, as well as the Bnei Akiva high schools, Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim.

Fromm dismissal upheld

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A labour arbitration panel has rejected a union grievance filed on behalf of former teacher Paul Fromm, upholding his 1997 dismissal for consorting with known racists.

In a 2-1 decision, the tribunal ruled that restrictions on Fromm's Charter rights to free speech and free association were justifiable given his position as a role model and mentor in the education system.

The ruling said Fromm, who taught with the Peel Board of Education, "conducted himself in a manner that had as a reasonable and probable consequence the undermining of public confidence in the ability of the Board to provide all of its students a school system free from bias, prejudice and intolerance."

Furthermore, despite being cautioned against such activity by the board, Fromm "continued to publicly consort with known racists, to publicly make racist comment and to publicly speak in favour of known racists... We have further found this conduct, which called into question the employer's (school board's) commitment to its multiculturalism policy, a policy reflective of the community it serves and the values enshrined in the Charter, contributed to a poisoned environment."

The tribunal's union representative dissented, saying the "burden of establishing that substantial harm exists and that the least intrusive measures have been chosen to remedy that harm" had not been met by the evidence.

Bernie Farber, executive-director of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, said the decision builds on the legal precedents set in the Jim Keegstra and Malcolm Ross cases, which both dealt with teacher conduct. (Keegstra was found guilty of promoting hatred of Jews in his Alberta classroom, while Ross lost his job as a Moncton, N.B., teacher for publishing anti-Semitic material outside the classroom.)

Farber said the Fromm decision spells out the public's expectations of teachers, to whom parents entrust their children's education. "Parents must know that their kids will be treated with dignity and respect." With Fromm teaching, that would be in doubt, Farber said. If teachers "make common cause with racists, they have no right to teach," and in terms of teachers' public conduct, the tribunal has rightfully set the bar high, he added.

Fromm said he would appeal the ruling in court, but Dominic Bellisimo, duty officer with the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers Federation (OSSTF), the union that grieved the dismissal, said the decision whether to seek a judicial review is out of Fromm's hands.

At this point, "the bargaining agent [the union] owns the grievance," Bellisimo said, adding the OSSTF has not decided on a course of action.

Fromm first landed in hot water with the Peel board in 1993, when it learned that in 1990 he attended a rally organized by the white supremacist Heritage Front and a year later attended a celebration of Hitler's birthday.

In 1993, the board cautioned him against further associations with racist groups. Despite the warning, Fromm attended an Illinois rally organized by the extremist National Alliance. He also attended a symposium in British Columbia attended by "individuals referred to as racists," the tribunal found.

Hatred's new vehicle

Eighteen months ago, Yasser Arafat unleashed war upon the people of Israel. He correctly calculated that Israel would choose to defend its citizens, thereby creating a new storehouse of intifadah images broadcast around the world – of bloodshed, of tanks against guns, of soldiers against boys, of Palestinian victimhood – to replace the weathered, less violent images of intifadah of more than a decade ago.

But with the new generation of images of Palestinian victimhood has come a new generation of reiterated images of medieval anti-Semitism. It is a persistently ugly strain whose virulence has jumped from the Middle East to Africa and appears now to be infecting Europe as well.

From the very outset, Arafat's Al-Aqsa war was blessed by local Palestinian clerics who urged their followers to "kill Jews wherever they found them." These exhortations, alas, were the logical theological conclusions to the lessons taught to Palestinian children in Palestinian schools.

These genocidal catechisms were given clever, but nevertheless transparent, camouflage, and, unbelievably, institutional sanction at the UN Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, last fall.

Recently, in the government-controlled, strictly monitored press of Saudi Arabia, a teacher from King Faysal University published an account of Jewish bloodletting of Muslim and Christian children to make cakes for the celebration of Purim. It was a grisly, gruesome, ignorant trip backwards in time and intellect to the foulest, darkest days of medieval Europe.

For months, we have been reading accounts of increased incidents of anti-Semitism in France directed against Jewish institutions and even against schoolchildren. Now, there are alarming reports of a vigorous, vicious campaign of anti-Semitism in Britain as well. It is spearheaded by Arab and pro-Palestinian organizations and a cadre of willing volunteers. According to reports in Ha'aretz, British university campuses are one of the campaign's most active battlegrounds.

At Oxford University recently, American professor, Joseph Massad, delivered a lecture titled On Zionism and Jewish Supremacy, in which he hectored that "the Jews are not a nation," that "the Jewish state is a racist state that does not have a right to exist." The student union at the London School of Economics recently passed a motion that declared Israel to be an apartheid state and prohibited the sale of Israeli goods on campus. Because a similar motion did not gain the requisite two-thirds majority at the University of Manchester to pass onto the record, "it was reportedly met by a wave of anger… by Muslims and Palestinians, with Jewish students being attacked and bricks thrown at Hillel House."

When he unleashed war against Israel, Yasser Arafat also unleashed, anew, hatred against Jews. History will ultimately condemn him as a malevolent, cruel, deceitful, corrupt despot. Until then, the western world must condemn and beat back the hatred that has rolled in once again like a noxious, danger-laden vapour in the vehicle of his war.

"Proportionate" means terrorism

The present foreign minister of Canada, Bill Graham, and his immediate predecessor, John Manley, have said recently that Israel should only take actions that are proportionate to Palestinian actions. Do they expect Israelis to murder innocent Palestinian civilians, at random, wantonly and without warning? Do they expect Israel to send suicide bombers into populated Palestinian cafés and pizza shops to murder babies and women? Do they expect Israel to send in murdering snipers shooting randomly at passersby?

Sorry. Jews, Israelis – indeed, any civilized people – cannot perform such acts of terror, even in times of war.

The world should be glad that Israelis are not taking proportionate action. There is no comparison between the actions of murdering Palestinian terrorists and Israel's selective actions against terrorists and the accidental killing of Palestinians who are used as human shields.

Graham and Manley should be fairer with their comparisons and take Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and his terrorist cronies to task and demand that he halt all violence and return to the negotiating table.

Jews need self-pride

The season for change has not yet come – not for the Canadian government. During the Canada-Israel Committee conference, its true colours emerged once again.

Prof. Gil Troy's call to speak "truth to power" (CJN, Feb. 28), is vital as an antidote to Jewish insecurity and complacency, but it won't shift Canada's politically correct, delusionary view of the Israel-Palestinian situation.

Maybe that will happen when we take real pride in being Jewish, empower ourselves collectively and unite actively to fight against anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. After thousands of years of exile, we truly need to ask ourselves: are we going to allow the Jewish nation, the Jewish people, to pass out of history?

Says Gerber not accurate

In her column "Who Will be a Jew?" (CJN, March 14) Jean Gerber attempts to clarify issues regarding the validity of "non-Orthodox" conversions. However, almost every point she makes is misinformed.

She says, "In biblical times, a woman who married an Israelite became a member of his tribe… Her children were Israelites by virtue of their father." Wrong! Although tribal ancestry is paternally dependent, belonging to Israel is determined by the mother alone.

This point is made in the Bible which sternly warns about intermarriage and, in the case of a Jewish girl marrying a non-Jew, states that their children may be led astray. This implies that the offspring are Jewish and may be led astray by their father. However, in the case of a son marrying a non-Jewish woman, there is no reference to Jewish offspring of the union, and so it is understood that the offspring of a non-Jewish women will not be Jewish.

When the Mishnah and Talmud codified this point, they were not creating a new classification, but rather were committing to print that had previously been studied orally.

As Gerber says, who is a Jew may be a "power issue" for some organizations, but for common "Jews in the street" for whom the sanctity of the Jewish nation affects the core of their being, who is a Jew is not a power issue but a highly spiritual one that will determine the unity and continuity of the Jewish nation.

JSA space concerns met

I would like to provide you with an update in response to the article written by Aaron Orkin about the McMaster University student centre (CJN, Feb. 28).

McMaster's Jewish Student Association (JSA) currently utilizes space allocated to them by the university. I have discussed the unique space requirements with the JSA's director, Judy Schwartz, and have informed her that the JSA can continue to use the current space that has been provided.

It is my understanding that this addresses the JSA's concerns.

Resources needed for "gifted" kids

Congratulations to Anna Morgan on a comprehensive and interesting educational supplement (CJN, March 14).

It is encouraging to see that our UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education schools are allocating more resources to students with special needs, thus opening up the system to a broader range of children. I note with sadness, however, that our community's "gifted" children must still leave the Jewish day schools if they wish to have their special needs met. What a shame it is for our community and its future leadership to be losing our brightest students. Perhaps, with more forward thinking, the current leadership will find the necessary resources to serve and thus retain these students, both for their own sakes and as an investment in our community's future.

Has spending on simchahs gone too far?

By RABBI BARRY GELMAN

A recent report in the New York Jewish Week ("Waiter, hold the knishes," Jan. 7) states that a group of 27 influential rabbis from Agudath Israel of America will soon issue a religious decree to impose limits on the number of people invited to Orthodox weddings, the number of musicians hired and the types and amounts of food served.

The rabbis are motivated by the fact that weddings in certain Orthodox communities are becoming prohibitively expensive. It has gotten to the point where "people borrow money to pay for them [the weddings]; they take out second mortgages," says Shia Markowitz, a leader in the Agudath Israel movement.

Precedent:

Jews faced a similar problem 1,800 years ago. The Talmud states, "Funerals in Israel became so costly that the expense was harder to bear than death itself. Some relatives even abandoned the corpse."

In order to alleviate this situation, Rabbi Gamliel, the leader of his generation and a wealthy man, "left orders that his body be carried to the grave in a simple linen garment." Said Rabbi Pappa, "And now it is the general practice to carry out the dead even in rough cloth worth only a zuz."

In 1978, the Grand Rabbi of the Ger Chassidim issued a decree requiring his followers to limit attendance at their weddings to 120 people or fewer, and instructed them to invite family up to the first-cousin level only. Today the community adheres to it. It has been reported that a wealthy follower of the Rebbe complained that he should be exempt from the decree because he was rich. The Rebbe's response: "Then buy yourself a new Rebbe."

The rabbis who have signed the recent regulation will refuse to attend weddings that do not adhere to the new guidelines.

Application to our community:

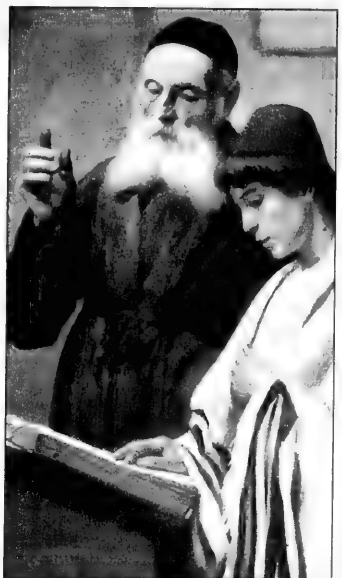
"The religious part of this moment [bar/bat mitzvah] is what happens in the sanctuary… But then comes the closing song of the service," Rabbi Jeffery Salkin writes in Putting God on the Guest List: How to Reclaim the Spiritual Meaning of Your Child's Bar or Bat Mitzvah.

"We say Shabbat Shalom to each other," Rabbi Salkin writes. "We leave the sanctuary. We are in profane territory… Then we can do anything we want. Briefly we were in the world of text, Torah, and holiness. But now, we are back in the real world, when the lessons and the Torah of the real world will be heard in all their glory."

I have seen a considerable number of families spend over $75,000 on a bar/bat mitzvah party. The costs include the hall, caterer, alcohol, entertainment, giveaways and clothing. But those who spend lavishly raise the bar for many who cannot comfortably afford it. Yet my concern about bar and bat mitzvah parties is not only about money. It is about Jewish values and the messages we send as we celebrate this important rite of passage.

Modesty does not just refer to dress:

There is a sad joke about an Orthodox family that plans an extravagant wedding complete with flowers flown in from Holland, free videos of the event for all, and mink-adorned dresses for the bridal party. Of course, since the family is Orthodox, there is a note appended to the invitation: "The families of the bride and groom request that all guests dress appropriately because we are very strict about the laws of modesty."



Oil on canvas by 19th century painter Edouard Moyse, Rabbi and Talmud.

The family in the joke thinks that modesty is only about the way we dress. But it is much more than that.

The characteristic of modesty demands a level of moderation and reserve in all areas of life. It asks us not to go "all out" in a given situation, but rather to show restraint, to find a middle ground between asceticism and excessiveness.

At precisely the age when we should be teaching our children the adult qualities of moderation, self-restraint and community responsibility, we are teaching lessons of entitlement and selfishness.

And while modesty doesn't only apply to dress, dress is a good place to start. Dressing our pre- and early teen children, especially the girls, in overly fancy and overtly sexual adult styles, as is the case at bar/bat mitzvah parties, forces them prematurely into a world of adult feelings. Of course, our children are exposed to all of this from the media, but that is a far cry from throwing them into those situations – and not just with parental approval but with downright enthusiasm. Our children undoubtedly suffer real consequences in these situations. Often, they are forced to encounter situations and feelings that they are unequipped to manage.

In A Return To Modesty, Wendy Shalit explains what she calls the "I have to" problem. "My daughter says she doesn't like wearing tight clothing all the time, but she says all the girls at school dress like that, so she's always saying 'Mom, I have to'!"

Adult culture:

There is another major challenge that confronts our community. Adults and children should "party" in different ways. But the truth is, most bar and bat mitzvah celebrations are simply a pretext for an adult party.

Consider this. Adults at the party often consume large amounts of alcohol. This sends our children a very clear message: the way to enjoy oneself is by drinking. It is not uncommon to see adults who are clearly drunk at these parties. Our children see this and are, at best, confused about drinking and, at worst, encouraged to drink themselves.

Similarly, parents often pay extra to have disc jockeys bring along dance animators. Do we really want to teach our 12- and 13-years-olds just how to "shake their booties" like 16 or 21-year-olds?

While it is common to hire a DJ, that does not mean we absolve ourselves of responsibility for the music at bar and bat mitzvah celebrations. We should pay attention to the messages we send through the music. DJs will certainly take instructions from their clients, who are, after all, paying the bill.

Where are the mitzvot and Jewish values?

The most disturbing factor in this entire area is that many of these parties have little religious flavour.

All too often at these parties there is little, if any, mention of the Jewish significance of the day. While there is the obligatory horah dance, one is more likely to hear the music and names of pop stars, movies stars and professional athletes then the name of a famous rabbi in a dvar Torah.

And what about kashrut? Even if a family does not keep kosher at home, there is spiritual significance to having a kosher bar mitzvah. Besides the traditional understanding of the reasons for kashrut such as remembering that "God cares about what we eat, that we can sanctify what and how we eat; that Judaism enters every sector of our lives, not only what we do in the sanctuary," Salkin reminds us that the bar/bat mitzvah is a communal celebration "and that all Jews should be able to eat at our celebrations, thus emphasizing the unity of the Jewish people."

The bar/bat mitzvah should be a time used by parents to impart Jewish values to their children. Some of those values include, appreciation, the quest for Jewish knowledge, modesty, self-restraint and community responsibility.

Some modest proposals:

Here are some ways in which some of the above challenges can be met.

• In his Book of Jewish Values, Rabbi Joseph Telushkin writes, "The Jewish community today needs a Rabbi Gamliel to change the nature of bar/bat mitzvah receptions… The time has come for some wealthy moral heroes to throw a simple bar or bat mitzvah celebration… If the first people to host such an event fear that their acquaintances will regard them as 'cheap:' or that rumors will spread that they are suffering financial difficulties, let them stand up at the party and announce that the $70,000 (or whatever sum) they are saving will be donated to charities of the bar or bat mitzvah's choice… the good they would do for many of their less fortunate fellow Jews would be almost incalculable."

• No more black-tie affairs.

The dress code of the party sets the tone of the party. We should remember that this is a celebration for 12- and 13-year-olds and not for adults. Keep the dress code informal. Children do not need to wear tuxedos and strapless, form-fitting party dresses.

• Here is an idea from Rabbi Salkin's book that may help parents implement some of these points.

"Parents of bar and bat mitzvah children make a pact with each other about how they will celebrate this rite of passage. Since their children are all in the same class… they want to ensure that there is a set of standards. So they agree: No themes. No parties until the wee hours. No outrageous music or spending."

Jewish day schools should initiate this conversation as early as Grade 1 with the advent of birthday parties.

• Families should scale back or even forgo the bar/bat mitzvah party altogether and replace it with a trip to Israel, an experience most families never forget.

• If celebrating with a "traditional" bar or bat mitzvah party, there are steps that can be taken to enrich the Jewishness of the event.

a. Choose a Jewish theme for the party. As Rabbi Salkin writes, "A friend told me that when a caterer inevitably asked, 'What's the theme of your daughter's bat mitzvah going to be?' he responded, 'How about Judaism?'"

b. As each guest is called up to light a candle, Rabbi Salkin says, they should be instructed (in advance) to offer the celebrant a blessing, word of encouragement or Jewish value that the young man or woman might embody.

What immediate lessons will our children learn from the decisions we make about how to celebrate their bar/bat mitzvah? When they look back on the event what will they remember? Let's hope that they will remember a modest and freilach event that celebrated family, life and Judaism, an event that served as a stepping-stone to goodness, to good living and a strong community.

Rabbi Barry Gelman is the spiritual leader of Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Montreal. McGill professor Gil Troy and Shaar Hashomayim's Jewish family life educator Jeremy Wexler contributed to this article.

An important decision

In a landmark decision, Israel's High Court of Justice recently ruled that persons who have undergone Reform or Conservative conversions must be listed on their state-issued identity card as being Jewish. This extends the Court's previous recognition of non-Orthodox conversions performed abroad to conversions performed in Israel.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The 9-2 decision has paved the way for many thousands of immigrants from the former Soviet Union who, according to halachah, are not Jewish to be registered in Israel as Jews.

Supreme Court President Aharon Barak emphasized that he and his fellow justices steered clear of the issue of whether Reform and Conservative conversions are valid under halachah, saying that they focused instead on a precedent declaring that the Interior Ministry's population registry must list personal details as provided by citizens, without question.

Though this seemed to satisfy Israel's Chief Rabbinate, the Shas party threatened to introduce legislation that would circumvent the High Court, and the man in charge of issuing Israel's ID cards says he plans to list non-Orthodox converts as "Reform Jew" or "Conservative Jew" on their ID cards, and not merely as "Jewish."

That "solution" is clearly temporary, for sooner or later there has to be a more valid arrangement. One is either Jewish or one is not. Terms like Orthodox, Conservative and Reform merely describe the practices or convictions of people who are Jewish; the adjective does not impinge on that particular fact, it merely describes people's practice, but the people are Jewish – period.

Still, the compromise that has been achieved in this matter in Israel presents some progress as far as I am concerned. I believe in religious pluralism, and while this is a step in the right direction and is perhaps a major gain, pluralism still faces a difficult struggle there.

I am not unaware, of course, that in the view of many strictly observant Jews, religious pluralism is an oxymoron for, to them, being "religious" means to be halachically observant. On the other hand, non-observant Jews, while remaining Jews, are seen to practise their Judaism in an illegitimate and therefore undesirable way. In consequence, some rabbis here in Toronto will not even appear on the same platform with me, a Reform rabbi, for fear that they might legitimize my rabbinate. Not surprisingly, I hold a different view and I welcome the latest development in Israel.

I might add that the term "Orthodox" covers a wide spectrum of people, from those who totally reject different denominations to those who accept the fact that Judaism is interpreted and practised in different ways. Some find this to be a dangerous trend, while others welcome it as inclusive and progressive.

Two faces of religious Zionism

In the struggle for the definition of Israel's soul, religious Zionism has played a unique role. Historically, it has sought the middle ground between Zionism as a secular political movement and the ultra-Orthodox rejection of the modern Jewish state. Since 1967, it has been a battleground for the competing imperatives of democracy, religion, demography, security and nationalism.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Effi Eitam and Moshe Halbertal represent two dramatically different faces of religious Zionism. For both, Israel as a Jewish state is a paramount value. But that's where the similarities end. Each of them arrives at dramatically different conclusions about Israel's shape in the future and its relationship with its Arab citizens and Palestinian neighbours.

Brig.-Gen. (reserve) Effi Eitam is Israel's charismatic rising star on the political right. He retired from the IDF in late 2000, amid controversy over his lack of advancement to the rank of major-general in the General Command. Eitam became observant during his colourful military career and claimed that his religious lifestyle was the impediment to his advancement.

Earlier, in the late 1980s, his career had faced a setback over allegations of responsibility for the fatal beating of Palestinians in the early days of the first intifadah. In spite of this, he was promoted several years later and in his last command was responsible for divisions in southern Lebanon. There, he opposed a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the southern Lebanese zone.

Eitam the civilian has been an outspoken advocate for the supremacy of Israel's Jewish character over all other values, including those of a liberal democracy. And he is convinced that Israel has no choice today but to re-occupy, or "conquer," the territories to guarantee its security. The implications for the Palestinians are clear. They will not have their own state, because this would compromise Israel's security, nor will they have full rights within Israel, because this would quickly compromise its Jewish majority Eitam's proposal is simple: Jordan is a Palestinian state, and it and other Arab countries should assume responsibility for Palestinian refugees, even if this means "expelling" much of the population of the territories into those countries. As for Israel's Arab citizens, he does not balk at restricting their voting rights in certain circumstances.

Eitam has emerged as an outspoken proponent of what is currently described not only as "re-occupation," but also as the soft "transfer of population" option. Other proponents of this approach are rightist leaders Avigdor Liberman and Benny Elon of the National Union, and Likud Internal Security Minister Uzi Landau. Many tout Eitam as the next leader of the National Religious Party, which has remained outside the Sharon government in active opposition, supporting Liberman and other voices to the right of Sharon.

Prof. Moshe Halbertal of Hebrew University and the Shalom Hartman Institute rejects the re-occupation or "transfer" option outright. He reaches a diametrically opposed conclusion, motivated by an equally powerful concern for Israel's security and Jewish character, but also by a compelling concern for its democratic nature.

For Halbertal, a Jewish state that is not a democracy is unacceptable. He sees a stark demographic reality. West of the Jordan, there are currently 5 million Jews and 4 million Arabs (1 million of these are citizens of Israel; the balance are in the West Bank and Gaza). Within a decade, the demographic balance will shift in the Arabs' favour.

If Israel remains in the West Bank and Gaza, its choices will be simple but unpalatable: To be a democracy, it will have to grant equal rights to all, and will quickly become a binational state like Lebanon, thereby losing its Jewish majority. To be Jewish, it will have to deprive 3 million Arabs of political rights, thereby forfeiting its democratic nature.

Halbertal believes that Israel can be true both to its Jewish and democratic values only by separating from the territories and dismantling most of the settlements. He rejects the absolutism of an Eitam. For Halbertal, security must be defined in more than strictly military terms and is firmly grounded in the moral character of the state that seeks it.

This is not a theoretical debate. It reflects the complex and harsh reality on the ground today, and it is painfully relevant to every Israeli and Jew.

Defending Israel in new Canadian environment

There is no point in parsing the texts – spoken and written – of Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham's speech to the Canada-Israel Committee dinner in early March. Nor will it likely help, one more time, to point out the moral difference between Palestinian acts aimed at the deliberate murder of civilians and Israeli Defence Forces acts aimed at disrupting terrorist groups and eliminating terrorist leaders, which also lead to innocent civilian deaths.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The speech is indicative of some harsh realities that will challenge the Canadian Jewish community for years to come. The political landscape is changing.

Many Liberals, Conservatives and NDPers, in conjunction with officials in Foreign Affairs now buy the "root causes" approach to foreign policy and the Middle East. They feel that Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is the root cause of the current wave of violence. (That the real root cause may still be, in many Palestinian, Arab and Islamist quarters, the ultimate hope to weaken and destroy the Jewish State, is simply not entertained.) Despite the jihadist fall-out of Sept 11, they think Palestinian terrorists are really freedom fighters.

Canadian politicians also realize that the Muslim and Arab populations in Canada are growing fast. There is a new sophistication and clout to be found within the pro-Arab lobby in Canada. The prevailing Arab/Muslim conformity on these issues makes their lobbying efforts all the more effective. Dissent is rare. The prevailing orthodoxy is of the "yes, but" school: Yes, Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden are not to be admired, but..., and the litany of blame-the-West excuses begins.

On the Israel-Arab conflict, there is still no Arab/Muslim group comparable to Peace Now. There is also no mass mobilization among Arab/Muslim Canadians to, say, overthrow Saddam and liberate Iraq from this despot. Quite the contrary. Any pre-emptive American strike against Saddam would likely provoke a solid chorus of condemnation. Perhaps Arab and Islamic communal leaders in Canada are afraid. Perhaps they see no alternative. Perhaps some are sympathetic.

It is tempting for Canadian Jews to respond with a comparable hard-line support of the positions of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government. But in Israel itself there are signs, from public opinion polls to nascent draft resistance, of an electorate deeply divided about a policy that seems all stick and little carrot.

What can Canadian Jews and other supporters of Israel do? They must, in fact, wage a two-track campaign directed both at both the Canadian government and the Israeli government.

One track must be a strong reactive and proactive defence of Israel's security needs and a condemnation of the Palestinian side's failure to reduce explicit acts of terror. The Canadian government and media must be reminded again of just how nasty Israel's immediate neighbourhood is.

But scoring debating points in a propaganda war, while important, is no longer enough for Canadian Jews. The other track must be a strong push for the resumption of negotiations, and support for American pressure towards that end. The second track has not been a priority of the Sharon government, and may be harder for the Canadian Jewish leadership to pursue at this time of travail for Israel. Ideally, the two sides could lurch back to the last Camp David offer by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, and pick up negotiations from there. A negotiated agreement would be better for Israel in the long run than unilateral withdrawal and separation from the Palestinians.

Not only would this dual approach meet Israel's interests, but it makes tactical sense in the new Canadian political environment.

Canadian Jews can urge Israel to pursue self-defence as if there were no negotiations, and pursue negotiations as if there were no terrorist intifadah. This is a familiar refrain for those who remember an earlier Zionist motto: to fight the British White Paper (a 1936 regulation restricting Jewish immigration to Palestine) as if there were no war against the Nazis, and to fight the Nazis as if there were no White Paper.

The Kirshner File

Popes promoted modern anti-Semitism

David Kertzer, a professor of anthropology and Italian studies at Brown University, causes extreme discomfort in the Vatican. One can easily understand why. In his newest book, The Popes Against the Jews (Random House), he levels two charges that the Vatican will be hard-pressed to refute. The first is that the Roman Catholic church was very much involved in the development of modern anti-Semitism. The second is that it shares responsibility for making the Holocaust possible.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Kertzer, who was in Toronto recently on a promotional tour, convincingly proves his thesis by scrupulously examining the blemished records of a parade of popes – from Benedict XIV and Pius IX on down – since the mid-18th century. It is devastating stuff.

Kertzer's appetite for the topic was whetted by We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, a report issued by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews on March 16, 1998.

Eleven years in the making, the report was commissioned by Pope John Paul II to determine what responsibility, if any, the church bore for the Holocaust. As Kertzer suggests, Vatican complicity in Adolf Hitler's Final Solution was first raised by Rolf Hochhuth's searing play, The Deputy.

We Remember made a crucial, if self-serving, distinction between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism. The Vatican acknowledged that anti-Judaism, promoted by the church, engendered attitudes of mistrust and hostility toward Jews. The Vatican, however, relieved itself of blame for anti-Semitism. Aggravated by 19th-century racial theories, anti-Semitism led to the horrors of the Holocaust. It was unequivocally rejected by church doctrine. Or so the Vatican claimed.

Kertzer did not buy into this anti-Judaism/anti-Semitism dichotomy and, as he would learn, it failed the test of historical scrutiny. "I was skeptical about the commission's report."

Around the time the 1998 report was released, the Vatican announced that the archives of the Holy Office of the Inquisition would be opened to historians. "Sources never before seen by scholars were now available, offering the tantalizing prospect of new insights into church history."

Kertzer, naturally, jumped at the opportunity to examine these archives. Having previously written The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara, the story of an Italian Jewish boy who, in 1858, had been forcibly taken from his parents on the orders of the church and then converted to Christianity, Kertzer had already immersed himself in papal records.

Born in New York City, he credits his father for originally interesting him in the subject of the Vatican's relationship with Jews.

"When I was a child, he was director of inter-religious relations for the American Jewish Committee. It was right after World War II, and he spent a great deal of his time working with Catholic clergymen to improve Jewish ties with the church. He had great respect and affection for his Catholic colleagues, and he was never so proud as when he received a special medal from Rome honouring him for his efforts to bring about Catholic-Jewish reconciliation. I would like to think that, through a very different path, I am in this book doing something to build on my father's work."

In The Popes Against the Jews, Kertzer demolishes the facile distinction between anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism and thereby conclusively proves that the church played an integral role in setting the stage for the Holocaust.

As he writes: "The notion that the church fostered only negative 'religious' views of the Jews, and not negative images of their harmful social, economic, cultural and political effects – the latter identified with modern anti-Semitism – is clearly belied by the historical record. As modern anti-Semitic movements took shape at the end of the 19th century, the church was a major player in them, constantly warning people of the rising 'Jewish peril.'"

With the full knowledge of the popes, the church disseminated the major tenets of modern anti-Semitism: Jews are trying to take over the world; Jews are rapacious and merciless; Jews are a foreign body and are unpatriotic; Jews should be isolated and ghettoized.

In other words, Kertzer argues,'Catholic anti-Semitism was a link in the chain of eliminationist Nazi anti-Semitism.

The church, he is careful to say, never called for, or sanctioned, the mass murder of Jews. But the legislation enacted by Germany and Italy in the 1930s stripping Jews of their rights as citizens was, in fact, modelled on church measures.

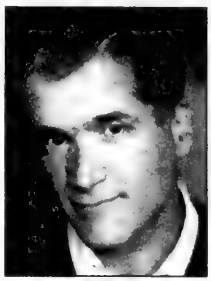
There is more.

Jews living in the Papal States were prosecuted when caught without the required yellow badge on their clothes. And as late as the 1850s, the pope tried to evict Jews from most of the towns in the lands he controlled, forcing them into ghettoes. In the Papal States, Jews were barred from holding public office, teaching Christian children or maintaining friendly relations with Christians. Driving home his point, Kertzer observes: "Church ideology held that any contact with Jews was polluting to the larger society, that Jews were perpetual foreigners, a perennial threat to Christians."

The Nazi objective of a racially purified society was dismissed by church fathers. Yet the Vatican believed that Jews had to be kept in social quarantine, or in the ghetto, a word whose origins are in the Italian language.

Pope Leo XII (1823-1829), for example, ordered Jews back into the ghetto "to overcome the evil consequences of the freedom that (they) have enjoyed."

In line with his jaundiced views, Leo XII also forced Jews to attend conversionary sermons and meetings during which Judaism was bitterly denounced.



David Kertzer

During this period, the procurator general of the Dominican order, Father Ferdinand Jabalot, wrote a booklet that crystallized the official Catholic perception of Jews. Wherever they live, he claimed, Jews "form a state within a state." Unless Christians reacted swiftly, he warned, Jews "will finally succeed in reducing the Christians to be their slaves."

Until the 19th century, Kertzer writes, pontiffs usually sided with Jews when they were accused of practising ritual murder. But as the 1800s wore on, the Catholic press, including publications close to the Vatican, harped obsessively on this malicious canard.

Kertzer devotes an entire chapter to Catholic periodicals, 130 of which were published in Italy in the 1870s. The most influential one of its kind, Civilta cattolica, was important in the rise of modern anti-Semitism.

One of its founders, Father Giuseppe Oreglia di Santo Stefano, was particularly vehement. Characterizing Jews as "eternal insolent children, obstinate, dirty thieves, liars, ignoramuses, pests and the scourge of those near and far," he lambasted them for (laying) "their hands on… all public wealth."

Anticipating race theorists, the priest observed: "For the Jews are not only Jews because of their religion... they are Jews also and especially because of their race." In accordance with this mindset, he reserved the bulk of his animus for assimilated Jews, who, he said, posed the greatest danger to good Christians.

Officially, the church stayed clear of the racial view that Jews were biologically different or inferior. The Vatican held that Jews had to be shown the error of their ways before they were converted. But, as Kertzer reminds us, the concept of blood purity was embraced by the church in 16th-century Spain. Lest he be accused of retreating to the far distant past to win an argument, Kertzer recites the case of a Jewish-born Czech Catholic who, in 1892, was showered with catcalls and jeers after his appointment as an archbishop. Monitoring the proceedings, the Vatican asked for, and received, his resignation.

The Dreyfus case, which convulsed France for about a decade, was yet another illustration of the church's propensity to defame Jews. Catholic organizations were in the forefront of anti-Semitic riots and calls for boycotting Jewish businesses, and L'Osservatore romano, the Vatican's official mouthpiece, was not surprised that Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish officer, had betrayed his country. A commentary in 1897 noted: "The Jewish race, the deicide people, wandering throughout the world, brings with it everywhere the pestiferous breath of treason."

So, too, did the church exhibit anti-Semitic sentiments in staunchly Catholic countries like Poland and Austria.

Kertzer believes that, in the wake of the Holocaust, the Vatican has had to radically realign its attitude toward Jews. He gives the current pope, John Paul II, credit for having improved relations with Jews. Yet the stench of Catholic anti-Semitism, as espoused by popes past, still lingers in the nostrils.

Synagogue, books damaged in arson

Nevertheless, the incident prompted Congress to send e-mails to hundreds of religious and community institutions in Ontario, urging them to be vigilant and reminding them to attend to security concerns, he said.

Rabbi Spero said he is feeling a mix of shock and gratitude – shock that someone would deliberately set fire to the synagogue, one of Toronto's oldest, and gratitude that the damage was limited.

"I said, thank you Hashem (God) that something happened to make us realize how precious it is to us, but we can continue to be part of your plan," he said.

In the days following the fire, Rabbi Spero fielded hundreds of calls from well-wishers and from those outraged that a place of worship would be targeted by arson. Hundreds of people have trooped down to Kensington Market to offer support and to help sort and preserve the shul's religious texts.

In addition to the spontaneous outpouring of support from within the Jewish community, two Islamic organizations condemned the arson.

Mohamma Ashraf, director general of the Islamic Society of North America, called the fire "a villainous act, and we hope that the perpetrators of this crime are apprehended soon and punished for their acts of unjustifiable criminality."

Saleha Khan, coordinator of the Canadian Association for Islamic Relations, wrote to Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, saying the organization was dismayed at news of the fire. "It is absolutely unjustifiable that an act of arson be attempted in a place of worship and deliberate damage be done to holy books.

"Our sympathies and prayers are with the Jewish community and the congregation members of Anshei Minsk Synagogue."

In Toronto's west end, a United Church clergyman expressed "our responsibility to declare our solidarity. Jews are our sisters and brothers... Many of us are disgusted by the news reports of the arson at the synagogue," said Rev. Hugh Reid of Kingsway Lambton United Church.

Outside, facing a busy street, the church's six by 10-foot illuminated sign was changed to read: "An attack on Anshei Minsk is an attack on all of us. Return good for evil."

Congress also condemned the act. "The Jewish community is shocked and deeply saddened by this criminal act targeted at one of this country's most venerable and beloved religious institutions," Morgan said.

Meanwhile, in a news release, the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre mourned the loss of the synagogue's books.

"While we also express outrage about the damage to the building, it is the books that are the heart and soul of Jewish life. These books represent the history of Jews in Toronto.."

About 2,000 texts, some dating to the 1860s and 1870s, were damaged in the fire, the rabbi said. Most were Mishnahs, Gemarahs, Talmuds, philosophy texts, books on ethics and Kabbalah, with a few siddurim and machzorim among them.

The books had been stored in boxes upstairs, pending categorization and the construction of proper shelving for them, he explained.

Saving the books, and burying those that are unrecoverable, were the priority in the aftermath of the fire, Rabbi Spero said.

High school students from NIFTY, a Reform student group, volunteered to spend part of their March break at the shul, helping arrange the books, he added.

The Anshei Minsk Synagogue, with about 200 members, is the last remaining downtown Orthodox shul holding daily services. It was constructed between 1922 and 1930 and serves those living and working downtown. Even on the day of the fire, when the building was unusable, Shacharit services were conducted outside the building and later in the day, Minchah and Maariv services were conducted inside. A previously-scheduled Shabbaton was to go ahead last weekend as planned, Rabbi Spero said.

The rabbi is adamant that other aspects of shul life will continue as well.

"When books are burned, you build a library. You can't let the perpetrators' destruction control the events, so you re-build."

Late last week, Congress announced its efforts to help preserve the shul's texts has born fruit.

Congress spokesperson Bruce Kurta said the Canadian Conservation Institute has received a special grant from Heritage Canada to fund the restoration of the smoke- and water-damaged books. (The amount of the grant was unknown at The CJN's press time.)

The restoration process will see a refrigerator truck pump cold, dry air into the synagogue's basement, turning it into a giant refrigerator. The goal is to control the humidity and temperature and retard the growth of mould, Kurta said.

The books will then be catalogued and moved to the truck prior to being shipped to Montreal. There, the process of removing mould and moisture from the books will continue. The restoration process could take up to a year to complete, he said.

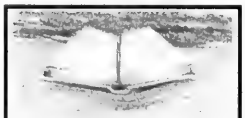
Jewish Life

Exodus tale resonates today

By RABBI IRWIN E. WITTY

Next week, Jews worldwide will begin celebrating Passover, sitting down at the seder to recount the miraculous deliverance of Israel from the bondage of ancient Egypt.

And while mention of the momentous event known as the Exodus is included in our daily recitation of the Shema and in Kiddush on the Sabbath and holidays, there is a special mitzvah on Passover known as sipur yetziat Mitzrayim, narrating in detail (not merely mentioning) what happened to the Israelites while they were enslaved by Pharaoh and the redemption they experienced when the Almighty freed them from their suffering.



To help fulfil this mitzvah, the positive injunction to recount our tale of woe and subsequent salvation, we turn to the Haggadah, the manual that crystallizes the story we are enjoined to relate.

Because the event being commemorated is more than 3,500 years old, it is possible one might feel almost completely detached from it. Since the mitzvah is one of retelling the Exodus story, it is not truly fulfilled, our sages say, unless we can identify completely with the Exodus, suffering its anguish and exulting in its triumphs.

What relevance is there, therefore, to an experience which is so recessed from our day that it is in danger of being recalled only perfunctorily, and with no consciousness that it is part of our lives today? Indeed, is there any relevance to it at all?

To overcome our remoteness from the Exodus experience, the compiler of the Haggadah inserted two arguments for the ongoing relevance of the Exodus story.

First is the declaration that if "God had not taken our ancestors out of Egypt, we and our children and our children's children would still be enslaved to [a] Pharaoh in Egypt." In essence, this thesis declares that, were it not for the redemption from Egypt, there would be no Jewish people today.

As the late great Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik pointed out, in recounting the Exodus "we are not recalling an historical curiosity, but rather we are accounting for our present-day identity."

The theme of relevance is developed further in a second section of the Haggadah. Says the text: "For not only one tyrant has risen against us to destroy us, but in every generation tyrants have sought to destroy us. And the Holy One, blessed be He, has delivered us from their hands."

Thus, the Exodus not only accounts for an essential element of our present Jewish identity and a signal event in our history, but it also serves as a vehicle to understand how we must relate to present-day persecution. Indeed, the Pharaohs our people must contend with today are more dangerous than ancient tyrants, because the means of destruction at their disposal are more fierce, but as in days of old, there is a Deliverer who remains the source of our salvation.

Little wonder, then, that as we read the Exodus narrative, and realize poignantly how relevant it is to the contemporary plight of our people, we declare that "in every generation a person should look upon himself as if he had personally come out of Egypt. Not only did the Holy One, blessed be He, redeem our ancestors, but us as well."

The past, despite the antiquity of the story, is therefore not only relevant, but current as well. Our liberation from tyranny, of which the Exodus story is paradigmatic, is the tale of Jewish history as a whole. Hence, it must be told and re-told, along with our thanksgiving and praise to God, both for miracles past and for deliverances present.

Rabbi Irwin E. Witty is director of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library in Toronto.

Not just another college break

By ANNA-RACHEL KRAKOWSKY

Guest Voice

While many college students spent their winter break soaking up sun in the Bahamas, a group of 200 students from Yeshiva University (YU) replaced the typical college vacation of drinking and partying with an intense week of education and outreach in Israel.

The group consisted of 100 men and 100 women who spent seven days on a mission called Torah Shield II. The goal was to show support to the land and people at a time when many Israelis feel hopeless and alone. This concept was not a new one for YU, which sent its first Torah Shield mission during the 1991 Gulf War.

Torah Shield II, which took place from Jan. 13 to Jan. 19, was not just a subsidized vacation for Zionistic YU students. Its purpose can be explained with the Hebrew expression chazak venitchazek – to strengthen and be strengthened. The participants were told prior to the mission that the goals were to bring hope and strength to Israel and its people, and bring back hope and strength to the Diaspora.

I was fortunate enough to be a participant and can attest that both of these goals were achieved. In just one week, we were able to travel from one end of Israel to the other, visiting army bases, communities, terror victims and political figures. We collected food, clothing and various other supplies and distributed them to orphanages, hospitals and communities in need. We were able to provide emotional support and encouragement to families of terrorist victims, soldiers and the alienated communities of Jews living in yishuvim throughout the country.

Yet the trip was intended to benefit not only Israelis but participants as well. We were privileged to hear insights from inspiring Israelis and spend time with the brave protectors of the country. We had the opportunity to travel through the Yesha communities (Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip) and spend time with families whose lives are at risk everyday. We had the opportunity to play with and visit Israeli children sick with cancer. And we had the opportunity to individually and personally thank every soldier we passed by.

Although we experienced all these positive things, as a group, we also saw many things that were far from pleasant. What sticks out in my mind are the oddly quiet streets, the empty stores, the vacant hotels. Although they seemed lonely and sad, with the arrival of a mere 200 people, they seemed full, happy and bursting with excitement. The group was, in fact, confused: the streets that were depicted by the media every day as dangerous, treacherous and fearful seemed not only safe but warm and comforting.

Nevertheless, precautions were taken and safety came first in every aspect of the trip. Everyone on the program discovered that the trip we all thought would be risky and dangerous felt more secure and safe than any vacation in Europe or on any island. Yes, we were extra careful, and yes, we had to use our judgment, but those things could not even begin to compare to the magic we felt in the Old City, the bonds of ancient history we felt in Hebron and the overwhelming sense of warmth and belonging we felt throughout the week. We all felt understood, cared for, and most importantly, incredibly safe and unafraid.

Although only seven days, the trip affected every participant enormously. Every Israeli we met thanked us profusely and we thanked them emotionally for protecting our land.

Yet I feel my mission in Israel is far more than the short time spent touring the land. Coming back from such an intense and moving week, I not only want to share my experience, I also want to encourage everyone else to have the opportunity to see what I saw and feel what I felt. While it is true that, especially now, Israel needs people, more importantly, we need Israel. The country is in one of its darkest hours and its people feel isolated and alone.

Ironically, every time Israel takes a turn for the worse, North American Jewry reacts in fear instead of in unconditional love and unlimited support for the country that is so vital to Jewish existence. Israel need tourists and visitors, but most importantly, Israel needs to feel the love and concern of its people.

More cleaning and preparing

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at preparing for Passover on the World Wide Web. Well, the cleaning's not done and neither is this topic.

When Marc Stengel of Owings Mills, Maryland, cleans out his pantry, he takes the opportunity to do another mitzvah at the same time. Instead of simply throwing out non-Passover food, Stengel organized a food drive to help a local food bank. His Web page has suggestions for bringing a Passover Project to other communities [http://www.imall 2000.com/serv/24hffa/24hffa.html]. And in Newton, Massachusetts, children get into the holiday spirit during Passover Community Cleanup Week [http://www.mazon.org/pages/nisan.pdf]. The kids are sponsored for collecting trash from the local Jewish community centre and a neighbouring park. The money raised is donated to Mazon: A Jewish Response to Hunger [http://www.mazon.org].

Cleaning a playground or a house may not be simple but it doesn't compare to the special challenges as Israel prepares for Passover. Even the Israel Defence Forces goes on alert for the holiday. According to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs Web site, "The IDF takes no chances, embargoing all packages from home just before and during Passover week in case they contain chametz goodies, thus ensuring that bases will be kept strictly kosher so both religious and non-religious soldiers can serve shoulder-to-shoulder during the festival period." [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0k000] And, according to the Philadelphia Enquirer, even Jerusalem's water supply comes under scrutiny before Passover. Rather than draw on water from Lake Tiberias that may be contaminated by chametz, secure well water is used in the city [http://shlk.com/26]. And if you think you've got cleaning problems, be thankful you don't run the Jerusalem zoo. They have to deal with hungry elephants that don't get their usual bread.

You may not own a pachyderm, but Fido and Fifi will have to say goodbye to chametz during Passover. New York dog owner Mark Levenson says, "Some people might think it's overkill, that there's no reason to do that. It's not the dog that's the problem; it's the dog food. According to 13:7, we may have no leaven in our possession" [http://www.kcstar.com/item/pages/printer.pat,fyi/3acc9395.406,.html].

I'm not quite sure how they conducted their survey, but according to the Brandman Research Institute, 43 million man hours are spent Israel in cleaning preparations for the Passover. Curious use of the term "man hours" since the study found that 29 million cleaning hours are done by women and 11 million hours by men. House cleaners account for the remaining 3 million hours [http://www.jr.co.il/things/ptrivia.txt].

Rabbi Berel Wein is very scrupulous about putting in his "man hours." His main task is cleaning the hundreds of books he has accumulated during a lifetime of learning. Rabbi Wein also finds time to revel in the memories each book brings back, as he says in his thoughts on Passover cleaning: "It may be chided, but never scoffed at. Pesach and its memories are why we are here and why we have the right to be here. It is paradoxical how getting rid of the chametz allows the memories suppressed by our everyday preoccupations to flood back into our minds and hearts. So, let us get on cheerfully with our Pesach cleaning. One never knows what one will find while cleaning the house for Pesach" [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0501/wein040301.asp].

Finally, the Jerusalem Post tells us about Yael, a resident of Jerusalem's Old City who makes sure her cleaning pays off – literally [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2001/03/27/RealEstate/RealEstate.23625.html]. "Every couple of years, Yael M. enters a frenzy of Passover cleaning, wiping out kitchen cabinets, washing out the refrigerator, emptying out closets and vacuuming the furniture in her apartment. Then she moves out." In exchange for renting out her home to a family eager to spend Pesach near the Kotel, Yael can earn $1,500 to $2,000 in cash. But then again, that means Yael has to move in with her parents for eight days.

Have a chag kasher v'samayach – a kosher and happy holiday.

Why the rush?

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Passover approaches soon, and once again we gather in family settings to celebrate freedom and redemption. For the duration of the holiday we must eat matzah to commemorate our rapid departure from Egypt.

It seems a little unbalanced that on the one hand, we engage in ritual that addresses such complex issues as freedom and redemption, while on the other hand, we commemorate how rushed we were. Is it the inconvenience of having to leave so quickly that infuses the matzah with meaning? How did we move from such abstract, complex issues to such mundane, petty misgivings?

Maybe it is not the act of being rushed that we remember, but rather the reasons for the rush. One strong, recurring theme throughout the Passover narrative is the idea of seizing the opportunities that unexpectedly arise.

Miriam seizes the opportunity of intervening with Pharaoh's daughter, resulting in Moses' being reunited with his mother so that she could nurse him. Moses seizes the opportunity of defending an Israelite slave from an Egyptian taskmaster, resulting in his leaving Egypt and encountering God at the burning bush. Ultimately, we all seize the opportunity to leave Egypt in that window of time before Pharaoh changes his mind.

Freedom and redemption are things you grab the instant you first see them; you cannot plan too long or deliberate. You must rush.

Moses and all of Israel were ready to leave Egypt the night of the 10th plague. In fact, the nation was instructed to prepare to depart so quickly that there was not enough time for the baked goods to rise. This instruction went beyond seizing the opportunity, for certainly the death of the first-born of Egypt should have convinced Pharaoh once and for all.

There is also a more subtle reason connected to the rushed state of departure, which comes through when we look closely at that last plague.

The Torah records that at midnight, the last plague begins. It does not last for an instant in time. It is not that all the first-born in Egypt die immediately at midnight, but rather that the plague is beginning at that moment. We know that not all the first-born die, because Pharaoh is still alive to summon Moses. It appears that the plague is cycling through Egypt bringing waves of death. It is uncertain whether the death is progressing by generation or by region or perhaps by house, but what is clear is that the longer Israel stays in Egypt, the more the plague will progress, and more people will die.

Our freedom and our redemption come at a high price in human suffering. We do not rejoice over this and we certainly do not celebrate it. The Talmud, the midrash and the seder ritual have moments when they insist we reflect on the pain that touched others. This does not deter us from our goal. We do not hesitate to seize our freedom, but neither do we languish and make the moment last while others are suffering – we rush.

We are commanded to eat matzah for many reasons. One of the messages is to remember that sometimes our survival necessitates that others suffer. We could not let the bread rise because delaying our departure meant more people would die. The midrash reminds us that we must focus on our goals, yet at the same time, it tells us: "It is forbidden to pray that a wicked man should die."

Spreading the word of the Rebbe in the schools

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is a small Hebrew sign outside the former Bank Leumi building at the corner of Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street that identifies the premises as the Lubavitch Yeshiva, Ohalei Menachem Mendel, Toronto.

Established in 1996, the yeshiva currently schools 110 boys, ranging in age from 13 to 19 years old – many of them away from home for the first time.

Inside, the boys sit at rectangular plywood tables as they immerse themselves in books. Around them, the walls are filled with talmudic texts and well- used tomes of scripture.

Besides the four full-time and seven part-time faculty members at the yeshiva, there is a group of mentors – young boys in their early 20s – who are available to help the younger students with their learning or to simply lend a hand when being away from home is too hard for a young boy to handle.

"If boys are coming from far away, we become older brothers for them," Gershon Avtzon, 21, from Brooklyn, New York, said in an interview at the yeshiva.

Gershon is one of the many boys who spend several years as mentors and role models in yeshivot around the world.

Varying in age from 22 to 24, the young men come from as far away as Australia to spend two years involved in various "inreach" and "outreach" programs before they get married and settle down.

Surrounded by a group of seven of his peers and several rabbis, Gershon told this reporter about the role and goals of the mentoring program that was initiated by Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn.

The Lubavitcher Rebbe instituted a policy where older boys become role models and mentors for the younger ones, Gershon said.

For these mentors, it's a matter of fulfilling the wishes of the Rebbe and at the same time learning about the satisfactions associated with teaching.

"When we explain [a difficult text] to the younger boys, it gives us an excitement and fuller understanding of why we're doing what we're doing," Gershon said.

In the schools, they help the boys achieve the goal of becoming independent learners.

When the boys first come to the yeshiva they need guidance, Gershon explained. However, by the time they're 16 years old, they're expected to study independently.

While they listen to lectures from the Rosh Yeshiva for deeper understanding, Gershon said, it is up to their other teachers and mentors to guide them.

The students spend their entire day in Torah studies – half a day on their own, Gershon said, adding that the other half is spent with teachers and mentors who help them prepare for tests.

The mentors also help the boys in the nearby younger boys school – Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad – where the students range in age from six to 13.

"Every week, we set up learning for the younger kids to come in and get a taste of the yeshiva," Gershon said.

"We also organize a Jewish version of the boys scouts," Gershon said, "called Chayalei Beth David."

The group of about 40 kids, between 10 and 13 years old, meet once a week in each others' homes and socialize.

"The boys learn how to host each other," Gershon noted.

It's important for us to be role models for the younger kids, Gershon explained.

"The future of Judaism is based on young people and it is our duty to show them what true Judaism is about," he added.

...and in the community

TORONTO — Their work seems never ending – they drive the Lubavitch mitzvah mobiles, go door to door to check mezuzot and encourage Jewish men to put on tfillin.

As part of an outreach program implemented by the Lubavitch Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn, many young boys go out on a daily basis to perform what the Rebbe termed "spiritual acts of charity."

Every holiday, these boys – Yossi Grossbaum, 21, from Melbourne, Australia; Gershon Avtzon, 21 from Brooklyn, N.Y.; Yehuda Hoch, 21 from Pittsburgh, Pa.; and Mendy Wolf, 20, from Chicago, Ill.; to name but a few – go out to get as many Jews as they can to participate in the mitzvot associated with the holiday.

For Purim, they give out as many misholoach manot packages as they could.

"We give it to people and they then give it back to us," Gershon said in an interview.

"Then, we give it back to them. That way we all participate in the mitzvah of giving," he said with a smile.

On Friday afternoons, the boys go out to visit different homes to encourage the women to light Shabbat candles; the men to put on tfillin and put up mezuzot.

"We get sponsors to invest in mezuzot so that we can ensure that every Jewish home will have a mezuzah," Gershon noted.

This past Chanukah, the boys gave out 4,000 chanukiyot with booklets explaining how to fulfil the mitzvah of lighting candles.

They also had a menorah parade with 40 cars bedecked in electrical menorahs, and 10 mitzvah mobiles.

The boys used 10 mitzvah tanks in honour of the Rebbe's 100th birthday, which will take place this year.

"We covered the entire city," Yossi said proudly.

The next major event will take place on the eleventh day of Nissan – March 24th – when it will be the Rebbe's actual birthday, Gershon said.

In recognition of the event, the entire Lubavitch community is planning another parade under the auspices of Chabad Lubavitch, Ontario, said Rabbi Yona Shur, executive director of Cheder Chabad.

Beginning at Chabad Gate at 10 a.m., 11 mitzvah mobiles will bring the message of Passover to the community by giving out brochures explaining the holiday and shmurah matzah to whoever wants it, Rabbi Shur said.

"Why 11, you might ask?

"To symbolize the fact that we must always grow [last holiday there were only 10] and to commemorate the 11th day of Nissan – the Rebbe's birthday," Rabbi Shur said.

MK sees no alternative to territorial compromise

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time in Israel's history when ein brerah meant there was no alternative to steadfastness in the face of Arab hostility.

Today, when Meretz member of Knesset Avshalom (Abu) Vilan employs the term, it is to suggest that "at the end of the day, there is no other solution but historical, territorial compromise."

Without it, he continued, "we will not have a democratic, Jewish state."

Vilan was in Canada recently as part of a 10-day North American visit that included a stop in Ottawa to participate in the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) parliamentary dinner. He also spoke to synagogue and student groups in the United States and Canada and addressed a gathering in Toronto sponsored by Hashomer Hatzair, a left-leaning Zionist youth group.

Vilan said there is no doubt the intifadah was launched by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in a bid to extract better terms than those offered at the failed talks at Camp David in the summer of 2000. But he said it's up to the "international community, the United States and Europe together, to make it clear to him there is no alternative but the negotiating table."

Vilan, who in the early 1970s served with former Israeli prime ministers Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu in Israel's elite Sayeret Matkal commando unit, said senior European diplomats have told him personally that they understand Arafat's machinations and share the view that only diplomacy can solve the differences between the two sides.

But the United States is currently distracted by its campaign in Afghanistan and its preparations for military action against Iraq. "They prefer to deal with Saddam [Hussein] in Iraq before they do something in the Middle East. That makes the situation in Israel very difficult," Vilan said.

"I think that if we find ourselves in a situation without real help from the international community, it will be very difficult to bring both parties back to the negotiating table."

Vilan, who has been involved in high-level political negotiations with the Palestinians at Oslo and served as a go-between between Barak and Arafat, said the Palestinian leader was not ready to make a deal at Camp David.

Arafat felt "trapped in a cage," Vilan said, and despite being offered 97 per cent of the land he was seeking, as well as a solution to the question of Jerusalem and a $20 billion (US) fund to help solve the refugee problem, "Arafat thought he had time."

He thought he could extract better terms if the Republicans won the November 2000 U.S. presidential election, Vilan said, and was expecting the violence he initiated would be similar to the limited "tunnel riots" of 1996, rather than a full-blown intifadah.

"Arafat hoped for more casualties on Israel's side, but he doesn't care what happens to the Palestinian people. In his view, he's in the middle of a historic march. That makes things more problematic. We're in a lose-lose game."

Vilan said continuation of the status quo is "very dangerous for the Israeli public. There can be a better alternative to living on our sword, like Sparta."

While saying that Israel must combat Palestinian terrorism – and that Israel could re-occupy the Palestinian territories in 72 hours if it chose – Vilan said that ultimately, "there is no military solution to the problem." Furthermore, it is not in Israel's long term interest to dominate another people.

The alternatives, he suggested, were a Lebanon-like conflict or a negotiated settlement.

Vilan said he preferred a political solution, for which "the Israeli public will have to pay a very heavy price," including the evacuation of more than 100 settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

He agreed that was not likely under the current Sharon-led national unity government, but he said even the Likud prime minister believes Israel will one day live alongside a Palestinian state.

He discounted suggestions that Arafat could be bypassed in future talks. "Arafat is their national symbol and nobody has the chance in the short run to take over from him."

Furthermore, "if he wants to control [the militants], he could do so in a few days. Arafat, with Fatah, is in total control in every small town and village. You cannot [attribute] their strength to the other groups."

WZO stresses klal Yisrael

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Zionist movements need to renew the concept of klal Yisrael, says Rami Kornblum, director general, department for Zionist activities, World Zionist Organization (WZO).

He was here recently to meet with executive members of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) and other Jewish organizations to determine the role of the Zionist movement in Canada.

Kornblum, 65, also secretary of the Zionist Congress, said Diaspora communities have tended to look inward, and have lost the feeling of klal Yisrael.

"We have lost it, and maybe rightfully so, but it affects the unity of the Jewish people," said Kornblum, who has served as a Young Judaea shaliach in the United States and in Australia.

He said the Jewish Agency and the WZO has declared the Jewish communities in Argentina, France and South Africa to be in distress.

"Argentina is in an economic crisis, and in France and South Africa there has been a rise in anti-Semitism. The conference in Durban was a festival of anti-Semitism, and that affects every South African on the street.

"We are paying very close attention to these communities, and communities around the world are recruited to take part," he said.

It is natural for these countries to look after their own needs, said Kornblum. "Their concern for Israel cannot be the same, but we cannot afford to lose the unity of the Jewish people."

Zionist organizations have to emphasize the importance of the centrality of Israel in all walks of Jewish life, he said.

"That is the raison d'etre of Zionist movements. Other communal organizations cater to the benefit of their members; it is not their mandate to be Zionist.

"These organizations are doing excellent work, however, and they show their concern for Israel through advocacy, by sending young people, and by going on missions."

Local organizations have been very supportive of having a strong Zionist federation in the community, said Kornblum. "Every now and then, though, we have to assess if the Zionist federations are adequately serving the needs of the community.

"The relationship between Israel and the Diaspora has its ups and downs. We need to redefine the role of CZF to make the organization relevant."

An important change is taking place at the upcoming 34th Zionist Congress which will take place in June in Jerusalem, he said.

"What is very important is that for the first time, out of the 500 elected delegates – Canada has 19-25 per cent that will be between 18 and 30. The constitution has been changed, and young people now have a voice."

The congress cannot rely on the successes of the past, he said. "Zionist ideals brought about the State of Israel; if it still has a role it has to come from the voice of young people. That is our future."

With this change, he said, young people will be able to define for themselves what they feel should be the aims of Zionism.

"The times of dictating to youth what should be done, are over. Things either have to be left to them or we have lost all hope," said Kornblum.

He is disturbed, he said, that the history of the Zionist movements is not on the curriculum of Hebrew day schools.

"We are blaming ourselves in Israel because it is up to us to draw their attention to it. We need to recruit shlichim to come over and create some interest in the subject."

The WZO has launched a movement to develop young leaders between the ages of 30 and 45, "which in our opinion is a lost generation for any community organization. Between juggling work and young families, these people have very little time."

On a positive note, he said, a North American Zionist federation conference was held two years ago in Florida, and out of about 400 young people who attended, about 40 were Canadian.

"The Canadian contingent is still active. They still get together to discuss matters relating to Israel and the Jewish community. They are trying to find themselves within the ranks of community leadership."

Canadians receive rabbinic ordination from Yeshiva U seminary

NEW YORK — Several Canadians are among the 147 students who recently received their rabbinic ordination from Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS).

The new rabbis include Shmuel Marcus, son of Rabbi Raphael Marcus of B'nai Torah Synagogue in Toronto; Steve Lacob; Joshua Joseph, son of Rabbi Howard and Naomi Joseph from Montreal; Rafael Lipner, a teacher at Community Hebrew Acadamy of Toronto (CHAT); Uri Etigson; Seth Binus; Solomon Kalkstein; Chaim Motzen, son of Cantor Yaakov Motzen of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue in Toronto; and Michael Engel.

The graduates received their ordination from Rabbi Norman Lamm, rosh yeshiva and president of RIETS, at the March 10 ceremony, in which Rabbi Lamm received the Aluf Torah Award, established in memory of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, considered the spiritual leader of modern Orthodoxy.

Also at the ceremony, Israeli president Moshe Katsav, delivered an address to the graduates, and received an honorary doctor of humane letters.

Aid to Magen David Adom spans generations

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Yael Shier, 12, twins Katy Korman and Shainey Himal, 50, and Gerald Berley, 80, don't know each other but they have something in common.

They all recently celebrated milestone birthdays and all their birthday gifts were contributed to Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel.

Yael's bat mitzvah invitation included a message in which she said part of the responsibility that comes with becoming bat mitzvah is to help Jewish people in need.

Yael Shiar

"Magen David Adom, the Israeli equivalent of the Red Cross, is responsible for providing essential medical services in Israel to all its population – at the scene of terrorists attacks, automobile accidents, natural disasters," the message read.

Yael, a student at United Synagogue Day School, noted in the message that MDA is responsible for the blood supply to all of Israel's medical institutions.

"Today the demands are great. Even ambulances coming to the scenes of terror have been attacked and destroyed."

She also noted that because MDA gets only a small percentage of its funding from the Israeli government, it must rely on donations at home and abroad to buy equipment and supplies.

Gerald Berley

Helaina Silver decided to plan a surprise 50th birthday party for her mother Shainey Himal and her aunt Katy Korman.

Many of Silver's acquaintances had served as MDA volunteers in Israel, so when planning the party, she asked guests not to bring gifts but rather to donate to MDA and the purchase of an ambulance. She says her mother and aunt were pleased with her choice.

"After Sept. 11, my daughter became even more aware of the importance to support the State of Israel and to provide emergency life-saving equipment for Magen David Adom," says Himal.

Berley, who was a longtime volunteer at the former Jewish community centre in Toronto near Leslie Street and Steeles Avenue, spearheaded the launching of MDA's office here. Today he is the vice-chair of the organization's Toronto chapter, a vice-president of the Ontario board of directors and ambulance chairman, looking for people to fund the cost of ambulances (it costs about $80,000 Cdn for one standard ambulance).

"I was pleased to direct my birthday gifts to this most valuable and needy humanitarian cause," says the octogenarian. "It is my hope that others will chose Magen David Adom when they are celebrating happy occasions, memorializing a loved one, or to bequeath money."

Berley adds that MDA helps the entire population of Israel regardless of religion or ethnic background.

"MDA responds to every emergency within minutes. The Israeli National Blood Services is a division of the non-profit MDA which is responsible for the collection, processing, testing and distribution of blood units and blood products throughout the country."

He adds that along with training ambulance drivers and emergency medical technicians, both Jewish and Arab, the organization is constantly adding and upgrading its ambulances to handle life-threatening situations.

Berley is proud of the generous individuals and organizations in Toronto who have contributed ambulances for MDA.

"We have sent eight ambulances in the past two years and it is my hope to continue to collect enough money to send many more," he says.

Fogel said that in Israel, it's all but certain Graham will hold talks with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and other top Israeli officials.

The CIC will meet with the minister before the trip and brief him on issues of concern, Fogel noted.

Fogel said Graham will probably also visit Egypt and Jordan, "and possibly – but I doubt it – Saudi Arabia."

Graham has visited Israel and the Palestinian territories before. In 1996 , he went as part of a CIC-sponsored trip for Canadian parliamentarians.

Fogel speculated that for Graham, a trip to Israel and the Palestinian regions will duplicate a similar journey by his predecessor, current Deputy Prime Minister John Manley, in May of last year.

Traditionally, trips by Canadian officials to Israel and the Palestinian areas have been fraught with controversy, and Manley's was no different. He made waves by saying that Israel "absolutely needs to stop" building settlements "as a condition for peace."

He called Israel's occupation of post-1967 territories "dangerous."

Manley returned to the region in late October, and called on Sharon to pull Israeli troops out of the West Bank. Instead, Israel pushed in deeper. A resigned Manley acknowledged that when it comes to Israeli policy, "they are not going to phone Ottawa before they act, that's clear."

No one's willing to predict what will be on Graham's mind this time.

However, Fogel remarked that the transparency of the Palestinian Authority's spending of international relief funds "is always an issue."

Since 1993, Canada has contributed $165 million to meet the humanitarian needs of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Last May, Manley announced that Canada was contributing $5 million to help create jobs and reduce poverty in the West Bank and Gaza.

Fogel noted that Canada does not give money directly to the PA, but rather to a variety of humanitarian and aid agencies, the Red Cross and various non-governmental groups, which then channel funds to various projects within the PA.

HOLIDAY SNACKS

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

When I was a kid, one thing I hated about Passover was that there never seemed to be anything to eat for my after-school snack. I remember yanking open the fridge door, peeling the tin foil off a neatly wrapped plate, pouting and slamming the fridge door shut, again and again. Sure, there was leftover chicken, boiled eggs and a shank bone, but like other kids, I was used to having homemade cookies or even a sandwich to tide me over until dinner. Things just weren't the same.

Well, this year, kids can turn their frowns upside down with these delicious and easy-to-make Passover snacks. Depending on their age, kids can make some of these treats on their own, but other recipes require the help of an adult. Enjoy!

MATZAH PIZZA

1 piece of matzah
tomato or pizza sauce handful of grated mozzarella cheese any toppings you like (mushrooms, olives, green pepper, pineapple)

Cover a toaster oven pan with tin foil, place matzah on top. Spread sauce on matzah, sprinkle on the cheese, add the toppings and broil until cheese bubbles, watching that it doesn't burn.

LICKETY-SPLIT BANANA SHAKE

1 ripe, frozen banana, peeled and cut in chunks
3 ice cubes (optional)
½ cup milk
a handful of other frozen fruit, such as strawberries or blueberries (optional)

Throw all ingredients into a blender or food processor and blend until smooth and thick. Pour into a tall glass and serve immediately. This delicious and nutritious shake can be enjoyed year-round.

BAKED APPLE A LA MICROWAVE

1 cored apple, peel on (McIntosh and Spartan work best)
1 tbsp. water
tsp. cinnamon
p. sugar
ll handful of raisins or other dried fruit (optional)

Place apple in centre of microwaveable bowl. In a separate bowl, combine raisins, cinnamon and sugar. Stuff apple with mixture. Add half of water to bowl and other half to raisins. Microwave on high until apple is soft and mushy, about 1 minute. If it is still not soft, try 30 seconds more. Allow to cool before eating.

EASY PASSOVER COCOA BROWNIES

This recipe comes from 1,000 Jewish Recipes by Faye Levy.

1 cup margarine or softened butter
2 cups sugar
4 large eggs
1 cup unsweetened Passover cocoa powder
⅔ cup matzah cake meal

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-inch square cake pan and set aside. Beat margarine with sugar and eggs in a large bowl with an electric mixer until very light and fluffy. Add cocoa and cake meal. Beat slowly to combine, then beat at higher speed until mixture is fluffy. Spoon batter into pan. Bake for 30 to 35 minutes until toothpick comes out dry and colour has changed evenly on top. Serve at room temperature.

CHOCOLATE MANDLEBROIT

2 cups white sugar
1 cup margarine or butter
6 eggs
2½ cups cake meal
½ cup potato starch
½ tsp. salt
1 cup chopped walnuts (optional)
2 cups semisweet chocolate chips

Topping:
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a large cookie sheet and set aside. In a large bowl, cream together sugar and margarine until smooth. Beat in eggs one at a time. In another bowl, combine cake meal, potato starch and salt. Add to margarine mixture. Mix in nuts and chocolate chips. Form into 2 long loaves and place onto baking sheet. Sprinkle on cinnamon and sugar topping. Bake for 50 to 55 minutes until toothpick tests clean. Turn off oven. Cut loaves diagonally into strips then turn each cookie on its side. Put back in oven until crisp, about 10 minutes.

INTERNET PASSOVER

Special to The CJN

I admit it – I am an Internet junkie and spend countless hours wandering the Web searching for interesting recipes and ideas for my cooking articles. I have foodie friends all over the world who send each other recipes instantly with just a quick click of the mouse. In culinary cyberspace, we are called pan-pals.

Here are some delicious recipes for you to try this Passover. Enjoy!

Jamie Stolper is the co-founder and food editor for www.shalomboston.com. This excellent Web site has an extensive food section, with menus, recipes and tips for the cook. Jamie is one of my pan-pals and we enjoy exchanging recipes, stories and food memories.

This is the recipe that Jamie's mother-in-law, Frances Stolper, came up with to replicate the bulkies that her mother made every Passover when Frances was growing up. She served them for the seder, then used the leftovers to make sandwiches for school lunches. She also made Passover bagels from the same recipe, shaping the dough into rings on a cookie sheet.

FRANCES STOLPER'S PASSOVER BULKIES

1 cup water
⅓ cup unsalted butter or pareve margarine
1 cup matzah meal
½ tsp. salt
5 extra-large eggs

Preheat oven to 450. Grease generously the top and insides of a muffin tin, preferably a non-stick one. (The dough will puff up and spread over the sides of the openings.)

Bring water and butter or margarine to a boil in a small pot. Pour in matzah meal and salt all at one time and continue cooking and stirring until the dough no longer sticks to the sides of the pan. Remove from the stove and place dough in a mixing bowl. Beat the dough for one minute at high speed until it seems lighter in consistency. Continue beating and add the eggs, one at a time. Beat another 1 to 2 minutes, scraping sides and bottom to make sure all the dough is mixed in.

Mound the batter in 8 of the muffin compartments and bake at 450 for 20 minutes. Without opening the oven, reduce the heat to 325 and bake approximately 35 minutes longer, or until puffed and browned.

Let the bulkies cool in the pan for a few minutes and then remove to a rack. Serve at room temperature. Makes 8 large bulkies. Recipe may be doubled.

This easy sponge cake comes from Julie Weisman, who works for www.ShalomBoston.com and comes from a family of great cooks. This delicious cake has only five ingredients and doesn't require separating the eggs. If you have a heavy-duty stand mixer that will beat on its own, this recipe is a snap to prepare.

"This marble cake is a staple in our house during Passover. We eat it for breakfast and the kids take a piece for lunch. It is one of the food items my family most associates with Passover," Julie says.

JULIE WISEMAN'S PASSOVER MARBLE CAKE

8 eggs
2 cups sugar
1 cup cake meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
2 oz. bittersweet chocolate

Preheat the oven to 350. Beat the eggs and sugar on high speed for 15 minutes. Add the cake meal and potato starch, beating at the lowest speed until mixed in. Melt the chocolate (you can melt it while beating the eggs and sugar). Pour ¾ of the batter into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan. Add the melted chocolate to the remaining ¼ of the batter and stir until evenly mixed. Spoon the chocolate batter into the pan and swirl it through with a knife.

Bake for 50 to 55 minutes. Immediately hang tube pan upside down on a long-necked bottle and let cool. Makes 12 servings.

"I am sending you one of my favourite recipes that I discovered in a WIZO cookbook. It can also be done with bread crumbs, but I make it with matzah meal for Pesach. It's very easy and delicious. I will probably bake this cake for my mother's birthday, which is on March 28. Although the recipe is called praline cake, there aren't any nuts in the recipe."

MARIANE KAUFMANN'S PRALINE CAKE

1 cup butter
6 egg yolks
6 tbsp. icing sugar
½ lb. bittersweet chocolate, chopped
¼ cup coffee
2 tbsp. Passover cognac
2 tbsp. matzah meal
6 egg whites
additional butter and matzah meal to coat the pan

In the top of a double boiler over simmering water, combine butter, egg yolks, icing sugar, chocolate, coffee and cognac. Mix well. Heat gently until butter and chocolate have melted and mixture is smooth, stirring constantly. Add matzah meal and mix well.

Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry. Carefully fold into the chocolate mixture.

Brush an 8-in. or 10-in. round cake pan with butter and sprinkle with matzah meal. Pour a little more than ⅓ of the chocolate mixture into the pan and spread evenly. Bake in a preheated hot oven (400) for about 20 or 30 minutes, or until it's baked. Cool completely.

Meanwhile, place the remaining ⅔ of the chocolate mixture into the freezer for about an hour, until well-chilled but not frozen. Pour the chilled mixture into the pan and spread evenly over cake, as if you were frosting it. Cover and refrigerate. Serve cold; cut into small pieces because it's like a rich chocolate bombe. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

6 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. grated lemon zest

Preheat oven to 250. Spray a foil-lined baking sheet with nonstick spray. In a large glass or stainless mixing bowl, beat egg whites with an electric mixer until foamy. Drizzle in lemon juice and beat until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in sugar 1 tbsp. at a time. Continue beating until stiff and shiny. Fold in lemon zest. Drop cookie mixture from a tablespoon onto baking sheet in small mounds.

Bake at 250 for 1 hour. Turn off heat but don't open the oven door. Leave cookies in the oven 1 hour longer. Remove cookies from oven and cool completely.

Makes about 2 dozen cookies. These can be frozen, or store them in a tightly covered container.

Gilletz has a love affair with food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Norene Gilletz, food consultant, cooking teacher and cookbook author, likes to take the easy way out.

"I can't follow complicated instructions and I don't like to spend lots of time cooking what will be gone in a few minutes."

As a result, all the recipes in her newly revised The Food Processor Bible (Whitecap Books), which first came out about 20 years ago, are easy to read, easy to follow and easy to cook, she says.

Gilletz, who self-published and self-marketed the first edition of the book, then called Pleasures of Your Food Processor, says that "every page has now been rechecked and rechecked and there are about 100 new recipes.

"The book is a mix of old and new, low fat and high fat. It's for people who are trying to eat healthy every day, and it's for those who want something rich for a special occasion. It's a book for everyone.

"My recipes are not rocket science. I want my words to make a picture. If I can't get visual, my readers can't. I use basic ingredients, and I'm flexible. Readers do not have to follow the instructions blindly," she says.

"I'm a real person; I want to be in and out of the kitchen quickly, and I don't want to stand and cook all day.

"I see thousands of recipes in a week and I see how I can incorporate some of them into my style of cooking. If there are too many steps, I pass it over. I try and keep instructions easy."

She says her favourite foods are hot dogs and corned beef and that she is a confessed sugar freak.

"I grew up watching my mother cook. She wouldn't let me cook though, and I still don't interfere on someone else's turf. I did learn how to make peanut brittle, fudge, brownies, chocolate pudding and macaroni and cheese."

Cooks can manage without food processors, she says, "but it makes life easier, and if we cook when we are stressed, the food does not taste as good.

"I talk to my food; I like to have a relationship with what I am cooking. I have a love affair with food."

A Passover section is crucial to any Jewish cookbook, she says, and The Food Processor Bible is no exception. "In addition to the recipes in the Passover section, many recipes throughout the book are suitable for Passover or can be adapted easily. These are marked in the index with an asterisk.

"We've created a Passover mini-index so it's really a book within a book. People have enough going on during Passover. I'm here to help make it easier."

Gilletz, whose other books include MealLeaniYumm!, MicroWays and Second Helpings Please, which she helped compile, says she would like to write a Jewish food memory book.

"Food memories live on long after the meal. If you smell a certain food, you can literally go back to where you were at the time. You can hear the clatter of dishes and the hum of conversation."

The following recipes are from The Food Processor Bible. Although the book is not in binder format, she says, it is user-friendly. "It opens easily without being propped up, and the coloured tabs make it simple to locate a chapter."

FARFEL, CHICKEN AND VEGETABLE KUGEL

- 3 cups matzah farfel
- 2½ cups hot chicken broth
- 2 medium onions
- 2 stalks celery
- 1 cup mushrooms
- ½ green or red bell pepper
- 2 cups cooked chicken (discard skin and bones)
- 1 to 2 tbsp. oil
- 2 tbsp. each fresh parsley and fresh dill
- 2 cloves garlic
- 3 eggs (or 2 eggs plus 2 egg whites)
- salt, freshly ground black pepper and paprika to taste

Preheat oven to 375. Combine farfel and broth in mixing bowl and let soak for 5 to 10 minutes. Drain excess liquid.

Slicer: Cut vegetables to fit feed tube. Slice, using medium pressure. Slice chicken with sharp knife or on the processor, using firm pressure. (If chicken is cold, it will slice more easily.)

Heat oil in large nonstick skillet. Add vegetables and brown quickly over medium-high heat. Add chicken and cook 1 to 2 minutes longer, stirring to mix well.

Steel blade: Process parsley, dill and garlic until minced, 8 to 10 seconds. Add to farfel along with remaining ingredients; mix well.

Spread mixture evenly in sprayed 7x11-inch glass baking dish. Bake for 45 minutes, until golden.

Variation: Bake in sprayed muffin tins for 25 to 30 minutes, until golden. Muffins make a delicious lunch for the kids. Makes 12 to 15 muffins.

Reheats and/or freezes well. Recipe may be doubled for a large crowd. Yield 8 to 10 servings.

PASSOVER CRANBERRY SWEET AND SOUR MEATBALLS

- 2 lbs. lean ground beef or veal
- 2 cloves garlic
- 1 egg (or 2 egg whites)
- ½ tsp. salt (or to taste)
- ¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
- ½ tsp. dried basil
- ¼ cup matzah meal (or 1 small grated potato)
- 2 14-oz. cans cranberry sauce
- ½ tsp. ground cinnamon
- 2 cups tomato sauce (or 2 10-oz. cans tomato-mushroom sauce)

Steel blade: Place meat in large mixing bowl. Drop garlic through feed tube while machine is running; process until minced. Add egg, salt, pepper and basil; process a few seconds. Mix into meat along with matzah or grated potato.

Place cranberry sauce and cinnamon in processor. Add tomato sauce through feed tube while machine is running. Process for 10 to 15 seconds. To avoid leakage from bottom of bowl, immediately remove bowl and blade from base.

of machine. Pour sauce into large pot and heat to simmering.

Form meat mixture into tiny meatballs, wetting your hands for easier handling. Drop meatballs into simmering sauce. Cover and simmer about 1½ hours.

Freezes well. Yield 10 servings as an appetizer or 6 as a main course.

PASSOVER KNISHES

4 potatoes, peeled, boiled and mashed (about 3 cups)
2 tbsp. margarine or oil
1 egg (or 2 egg whites)
½ cup matzah meal
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
1¼ cups cooked brisket or chicken leftover gravy or broth, if needed

'Food processor makes life so easy'

Preheat oven to 400. Combine mashed potatoes with margarine or oil, egg, matzah meal, salt and pepper; mix well.

Steel blade: Trim fat from meat or chicken; cut in chunks. Process until minced, about 10 seconds. If mixture is dry, moisten with a little gravy or broth. Season to taste.

Oil the palms of your hands and shape potato mixture into flat patties. Place about 2 tbsp. meat filling in centre of each patty; wrap potato mixture around filling to enclose it. Flatten slightly and make an indentation in centre of each knish with your finger. Place on sprayed baking sheet and bake for about 35 minutes, until golden brown.

Variation: For a vegetarian alternative, substitute cooked chopped broccoli, spinach or sautéed mushrooms and onions.

These reheat very well or may be frozen. Yield 8 to 10 knishes.

PITTA
(submitted by Grace Zweig)

6 matzot
1 box chopped spinach, defrosted
1 pkg. farmers cheese or 1 carton dry cottage cheese
2 eggs
1 tsp. salt

Soak matzot in warm water for 5 minutes. Place on towel to drain. Grease shallow 7x9-inch baking pan. Carefully place a layer of matzah in pan. Mix defrosted spinach with cheese and eggs. Add salt. Spread this on top of matzah, and top filling with another layer of wet matzah. Add another layer of cheese mixture. Repeat until all the matzot and filling are used. Cover pan with aluminum foil and bake at 400, approximately 35 to 40 minutes.

Variation: Substitute sauteed onions (6) for spinach to make an onion casserole.

HUNGARIAN-STYLE GOULASH STEW
(submitted by Sheldon Kirshner)

Fry one pound of stewing beef cut into small chunks, with onions and garlic. Add 17 ounces of crushed tomatoes and sliced up green peppers. Then add a bit of water. Cook under low heat for about three hours, until beef is tender. Voila!

ALMOND MACAROONS
(submitted by Frances Kraft)

These were inspired by a recipe in Martha Stewart Living, April 1995.

¼ c. sugar
2 c. unsweetened shredded coconut
½ c. ground almonds
2 large egg whites
1½ tsp. almond extract (or to taste)
pinch of salt

Combine all ingredients in a large bowl. Use hands to mix well. Shape into one-inch balls and place on cookie sheet lined with parchment paper, about one inch apart. Bake in pre-heated 350-degree oven for 15 minutes, or until golden.

KUGEL
(submitted by Frances Kraft's neighbour)

You can substitute any vegetable; cut before freezing.

2 boxes latke mix
1 tbsp. oil
1 head broccoli, cut small and cooked
½ head cauliflower, cut small and cooked

Make up 2 boxes of latke mix as for latkes. Add about 1 tbsp. oil (the same amount you'd use for the bottom of the pan if making latkes). Add vegetables, already cooked (e.g. microwaved), cut small. Bake at 350 for about an hour in a 9x13-inch pan. Top should be a little brown. Can adjust up or down (e.g. 1 box for 8x8-inch pan etc.). Cut before freezing. Makes 20 servings.

CARROTS

2 lbs. frozen baby carrots
1 cup honey
1 cup orange juice
1 can pineapple chunks, drained

Cook baby carrots. Boil honey and orange juice together in microwave or on top of stove. Pour over carrots. Put drained pineapple chunks on top. Makes 8 servings.

PASSOVER QUICHE
(submitted by Bev Bergman)

1½-2 cups grated cheese
4 eggs
¼ tsp. salt
dash pepper
1 medium onion, chopped
¼ lb. mushrooms, sliced
½ each medium red and green pepper
1½ cup milk
1 tsp. potato flour

Place cheese in bottom of 8-in. pan. Cover cheese with vegetables that have been sauteed in butter. Season with salt and pepper. Beat together eggs, milk, salt and potato flour. Pour over vegetable layer. Sprinkle with paprika and bake at 375 for 40-45 minutes.

CRUNCHY CASHEW FISH
(submitted by Louise Wolman)

tourmaline or turbot or any thick white fish cashew nuts crushed or finely processed salt pepper and garlic
1 egg (or egg white)

Wash fish, pat dry on paper towel. Dip in egg white. Roll in nut mixture. Pan fry in oil until crunchy on one side. Turn carefully once (pecan nuts can also be used). Fish never tasted so delish!

Sharing Secrets

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rona Cappell and Elise Mecklinger call their new cookbook, Sharing Secrets, a Jewish cookbook with a nouvelle spin.

They edited Sharing Secrets as a fund-raising project for Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary, and it was created to be a "user-friendly reference book to which all manner of cooks can refer."

Cappell, a social worker, and Mecklinger who has a master's degree in library science, say the book is "a marriage of our professional and research skills.

"We had worked together on an ad book for an auxiliary gala and we wanted to work on another project. Cooking has always been our passion, and when we approached the auxiliary board with our idea for a cookbook they said, 'Go for it,'" says Cappell.

All proceeds from the book go towards the auxiliary's $6-million Breathe Life into Birth campaign, committed to the establishment of the hospital's Centre for Excellence in Mothers' & Infants' Health.

In planning the book, the pair collected recipes from members of the Mount Sinai community and had all recipes taste tested.

"Every month, 12 auxiliary members got together to cook and critique each other's recipes. It was a potluck lunch with a flair.

"At the end, we added certain recipes so the book would be well-rounded. We wanted to make sure that, come yontif, we could offer heimishe recipes that have endured for years," says Mecklinger.

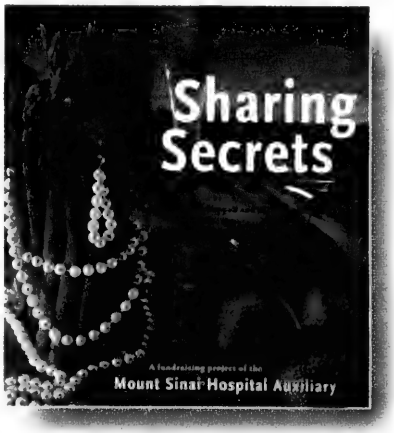
The book was launched Dec. 6 and "it has gotten unbelievable feedback. We initially printed 2,500 copies, and five weeks later we had less than 700 left. The response was phenomenal," says Cappell.

Both women are vice-presidents on the hospital's auxiliary board and they give credit to board president Marlene Borins for her "complete support of the project. She was a constant source of encouragement."

They also owe thanks, they say, to local cookbook author and cook Norene Gilletz who helped proofread recipes. "We're grateful for her expertise."

The pair plan to approach synagogue sisterhoods and other Jewish organizations in order to market Sharing Secrets.

"We're also going to do cooking demonstrations. We want to reach an untapped group of people. We've spent two years focusing on getting the book down; now we want it marketed.



"We raised the money for the book, organized the recipes, proofread it, indexed it and styled it. Would we do it all over again? In a second."

This Passover, try the following recipes from Sharing Secrets.

CABBAGE ROLLS
By Esther Mecklinger

To separate the leaves, put the cabbage in the freezer overnight. The next day put the cabbage in boiling water. The leaves will easily separate.

For an added treat put a pound of flunken into the pot after cooking the onion.

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 large cooking onion cut into ¼-in. dice
1 28-oz. can tomatoes
¼ cup ketchup
¼ cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup matzah meal
2½ lbs. mix of any of ground beef, veal, turkey, or chicken salt and pepper to taste leaves of 1 cabbage

In a large saucepan heat oil over medium heat. Add onion and cook 2-3 minutes or until browned. Add tomatoes, ketchup, brown sugar and lemon juice and stir until thoroughly blended. Let mixture come to a boil. Cover and reduce heat to simmer.

Reserve ¼ cup of liquid. In a large mixing bowl, mix together meat, matzah meal and reserved liquid with a wooden spoon. Place an equal portion (approx. 1 tbsp.) of filling in the middle of each cabbage leaf and roll up envelope-style.

Uncover saucepan and gently lower rolls into the sauce. Cover and simmer for about 2 hours.

Place saucepan uncovered in a preheated 250-degree oven for another 2 hours.

FARFEL CHICKEN AND VEGETABLE KUGEL
By Suzanne Shuchat

3 cups matzah farfel
2 cups chicken stock
3 tbsp. oil
2 onions, finely chopped
1 tsp. fresh minced garlic

Pesach & the diabetic

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish law considers those with diabetes to be cholim – people with a life-threatening illness; nevertheless, the disease can usually be controlled and diabetics should try to observe as much as possible of Jewish ritual, says Rabbi Chaim Sacknowitz, director of guidance at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Even if the obligation of the mitzvot is not binding on cholim, nevertheless, on Pesach a diabetic should act as much as possible as if he or she was healthy, Rabbi Sacknowitz said at the pre-Pesach meeting of the Jewish diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetic Association, held at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

After 10 a.m. on the day of the first seder (March 27 this year), he said, one is not permitted to eat chametz or matzah. Since people with diabetes have to eat on a regular basis, they should eat fish, meat, fruit or vegetables to keep their blood sugar stable.

Eating at the seder is somewhat more difficult, Rabbi Sacknowitz acknowledged, especially since the meal generally comes much later than regular mealtimes. The rabbi suggested that the diabetic should try to eat a meal before the seder, being careful to leave room for the matzah.

It is a specific mitzvah to eat matzah at the seder, Rabbi Sacknowitz said. The issue is how much matzah constitutes fulfilling this obligation.

One must eat a keziut of matzah three times during the seder, he said, once during the Hamotzi, once with the Hillel sandwich (when matzah is eaten together with maror) and once with the afikoman.

A keziut, in the most lenient opinion, is one-third of a machine-made matzah or one quarter of a round, hand-made one. This means that a diabetic, for whom the bare minimum is acceptable, the rabbi said, need only eat one whole machine-made matzah or three- quarters of a hand-made one.

Wine is another problem. The rule is to drink four cups of wine ("drink, not sip," Rabbi Sacknowitz added). Here too there is some controversy about the amount.

Each cup, he said, must be a reviit, which, again in the most lenient interpretation, is three ounces. While wine is generally very high in sugar, one is permitted to dilute it up to 3½ times its volume, preferably with grape juice, but if necessary with water.

During the seder, then, one must drink 12 ounces of wine, which can be diluted if necessary.

Another option is to drink dry wine, which by definition has no sugar in it.

Other foods eaten at the seder, such as celery, are not much of a problem for diabetics, he said.

With these leniencies, it should not be difficult to have an appropriate amount of wine and matzah and still control one's blood sugar, Rabbi Sacknowitz said. "It comes from the biblical description of mitzvot as 'vechai bahem,' that you should live by these laws and not die by them."

Another problem on Pesach is medications. Many medications contain starch, usually corn flour, he explained.

"Rabbis and some pharmacies have lists of approved medications, and if one can substitute without any harm, one should do so. If not, or the adjustment would need a long time, then just keep on with the regular one."

Shirley Glatt, co-founder of the Jewish diabetes chapter along with Esther Schwartz, made a plea for volunteers. Over 100 people come to nearly every program, she told The CJN, but the same few people have been active almost since the beginning.

She said there are not really formal titles for the positions; everyone just does what needs to be done. Among the jobs are planning the programs, arranging for commercial displays and door prizes, and manning the door for events. For more information or to volunteer, call Shirley Glatt at 416-225-1989.

OMISSION

In last week's story "Norene Gilletz's Passover food tour," we introduced a chicken dish from her cookbook MealLeaniYumm! and then inadvertently omitted the recipe. Here it is now.

GLORIA'S LIMELIGHT ROAST CHICKEN

3½-lb. (1.6-kg) whole chicken salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
1 tsp. dried basil
3 limes
1 or 2 stalks celery, cut into chunks
¼ c. chopped parsley or coriander (cilantro)

Rinse chicken and dry well. Loosen skin; rub seasonings inside the cavity and under skin of chicken. Squeeze juice of one lime over chicken. Marinate for 1 hour at room temperature or cover and marinate in the fridge overnight. Pierce limes with a fork. Place limes, celery and parsley inside the chicken. Close up openings with metal skewers. Place chicken on its side in a roasting pan.

Preheat oven to 425. Roast uncovered for 20 minutes. Turn chicken onto its other side and roast 20 minutes more. Reduce heat to 350 and roast breast side up 20 minutes longer, until golden and crisp. Remove chicken from oven. Strain fat from pan juices. Place pan juices in a gravy boat. Cut up chicken; remove skin, limes, celery and parsley. Garnish with additional lime slices.

Makes 4 to 6 servings. Reheats and/or freezes well.

Combine farfel and broth in a large mixing bowl. In a large skillet, heat oil over medium heat. Add onions, garlic, celery, mushrooms and green pepper. Sauté 2-3 minutes. Add chicken and sauté 2 more minutes.

Add mixture to farfel and combine. Add eggs and stir until blended. Sprinkle with salt, pepper and paprika. Transfer to 2-quart baking dish that has been sprayed with cooking spray. Bake in the oven at 350 for 1 hour, until golden. Yield: 8-12 portions.

FROZEN LEMON PIE

By Barbara Grossman

For an alternative crust, combine 1½ cups macaroon crumbs, 4 tbsp. melted butter or margarine, and 2 tbsp. sugar. For an extra treat serve with a raspberry coulis.

Crust

12 large Passover mandlebroit, crushed into crumbs
½ cup butter or margarine, melted

Combine crumbs and butter in a mixing bowl. Place in the bottom of a 9-inch spring form pan that has been sprayed with cooking spray.

6 eggs
6 egg yolks (reserve whites for meringue)
1 cup lemon juice
zest of 1 lemon
2¼ cups sugar
6 egg whites
6 tbsp. sugar

Place eggs, yolks, lemon juice, zest and sugar in the top of a double boiler. Whisk together over medium low heat until thick, about 3-5 minutes. Set aside to cool. Meanwhile place egg whites in the bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the wire whisk. Beat at medium speed about 2 minutes. Add sugar and continue to beat until stiff peaks form. Fold meringue gently into lemon mixture. Pour into spring form pan. Freeze for at least 12 hours.

Meringue

6 egg whites
5 tbsp. sugar

Place egg whites in the bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the wire whisk. Beat at medium speed about 2 minutes. Add sugar and continue to beat until stiff peaks form. Cover frozen lemon pie with meringue. Broil a couple of minutes until brown. Refreeze until ready to serve.

BAKE WHILE YOU SLEEP MERINGUES

By Ellin Kert

These are wonderful for Passover. Kids love them! This recipe makes about 30 cookies.

2 egg whites
⅔ cup white sugar
pinch of salt
½ tsp. vanilla
1 cup chocolate chips
1 cup chopped nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Place egg whites and salt in the bowl of an electric mixer set up with the wire whisk. Beat at medium speed until egg whites are stiff. Gradually beat in sugar. Add vanilla. Fold in chocolate chips and nuts (if using). Drop by teaspoonfuls on ungreased cookie sheet. Place in oven and turn oven off. Go to bed. These cookies will bake while you sleep.

HONEY GARLIC CHICKEN WINGS

By Eleanor Long

½ cup liquid honey
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup water
3 tbsp. ketchup
1 tsp. minced fresh garlic
½ tsp. ground ginger
½ tsp. salt
3 lb. chicken wings (cut each wing into 2 pieces)
¼ cup margarine

In a small saucepan, heat honey, lemon juice, water, ketchup, garlic, ginger and salt over medium heat until just boiling. Pour marinade into a mixing bowl. Add wings to the bowl and coat thoroughly. Marinate in the refrigerator for several hours, turning pieces often.

Put margarine in a 9x13-inch baking dish and place in pre-heated 400-degree oven for a few minutes, until melted. Remove chicken from marinade, shaking pieces to remove excess liquid. Reserve marinade, refrigerating it until needed.

Place wings in baking dish, turning them over in margarine to coat on all sides. Bake uncovered for 25 minutes. Turn pieces over and bake another 20 minutes. Pour reserved marinade over top and bake another 10 minutes. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

BEEF STEW

By Lesley Campbell

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. minced fresh garlic
1 medium onion, cut in ½-in. dice
2 lbs. stewing beef
1 10-oz. can tomato sauce
1 10-oz. can tomato soup
½ tsp. sugar, 1 tsp. paprika, 1 tsp. salt, 1 tsp. pepper
4 carrots, cut in 1-inch chunks
5 medium potatoes, quartered

In a large Dutch oven or stockpot, heat oil over medium heat. Add garlic and onions and sauté 3 minutes, until softened. Remove from pan and set aside. Add beef and sauté about 3 minutes per side. Remove from pan and set aside. Drain fat from pot. Return beef to pot. Add tomato sauce, tomato soup, sugar, paprika, salt and pepper. Reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer for 1 hour. Add carrots and potatoes and continue to simmer for 45 minutes, or until tender. Yield: 4 to 5 servings.

Arts festival brings colour to winter days

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A vivid colour photograph of a gekko lizard, its skin rich with texture; a detailed charcoal rendering of a hand; and an exuberant painted homage to her mother by one of the participants were among the pieces on display at the kick-off event for this year's campus arts festival.

Colouring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Creativity – a project of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) – ran over four days recently at four different venues. It was the largest event of its kind since the festival's inception four years ago.

The fifth annual showcase of art and performing art included a visual art display at Holy Blossom Temple's Cecile & Harry Pearl Gallery, comprising 45 pieces by 23 artists; a screening of eight films at the Bloor Cinema, a theatre/dance/spoken-word evening at Artword Theatre, and a music night at Berlin Nightclub.

The festival was almost a year in the making, said Sarah Zelcer, JCS arts and culture co-ordinator, who worked with a team of about 20 student organizers.

At the kick-off event at Holy Blossom, Zelcer credited JCS for supporting arts and culture programming. Without the festival, she said at the opening ceremonies, there would be "a very wide void" in Jewish student life.

Glennie Lindenberg, addressing the opening of the festival on behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (JCS' largest funder), said the festival "reflects the community's commitment to outreach and to enhancing Jewish identity initiatives."

The festival is part of a yearlong program of seminars, workshops and weekend retreats that bring together a diverse group of students who wouldn't necessarily involve themselves in Jewish campus life, said Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS.

"These are students who are happy to express their Jewishness through their art, their music, their drama, and their film," Kaye said. "That was something we wanted to connect with."

For 22-year-old Jodi Goldfinger, a photography student at Humber College who shot the gekko at the Tampa Zoo and who also had a second photo on display, the festival was an opportunity to connect with other Jewish students her age. Humber, she said, has no Jewish student organization and few Jewish students.

Fellow photographer Zavi Lerman, 18, a first-year fine arts student at York University, had four black-and-white shots, taken at Camp Gesher, on display. Three were carefully composed scenes, sharp and linear; the fourth, she explained, was serendipitous, capturing a camper who had paused in a downpour.

Lital Bar, 24, a former York fine arts student who switched to anthropology, had two striking pieces in the exhibit, a watercolour and an oil painting exploring spirituality and the birth of Eve in a semi-abstract style.

Yigal Rifkind, a 23-year-old student at Osgoode Hall Law School, has participated in past festivals, and this year had the charcoal sketch of his own hand, as well as a sculpture, to his credit. "You can always afford a few hours," he said, when asked how he has time to create such detailed work.

Filmmaker Josh Shultz, of Concordia University, paid tribute to a family elder in his film Zaidie, as did University of Moncton graduate Michaëlla Etienne, 25, who spent months on a sequin-studded tribute to her mother.

In Etienne's painting, which includes a quote from Birkat Hamazon requesting a blessing for "my mother, my teacher," the blonde mother and her daughter, whose dark skin reflects her Haitian heritage on her father's side, are embracing, their hands clasped and a sheltering wing extending from each around the other.

"My mother's [wings] are much more developed than mine," said Etienne, who also lauded the work of JCS, noting that there is "an activity for every student."

Winnipeg camp celebrates 50th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Camp Massad kicked off its 50th anniversary celebrations earlier this month with a Shabbat service and a gala banquet at Winnipeg's Victoria Inn that captured the essence of the Massad experience – the use of the Hebrew language – in song and skits.

The Massad campsite is located 50 miles north of Winnipeg at Winnipeg Beach, a summer resort community that has long been popular with the city's Jewish community. Like other camps, Massad offers swimming, boating and sports, but it also emphasizes arts and crafts, drama and dance, as well as singing and evening programs such as Maccabia, Televisia and Festival designed to promote Jewish identity and creative expression.

Hebrew is the working language of the camp, but fluency is not a prerequisite for attendance.

The 50th anniversary Shabbat service attracted about 200 camp alumni and their families, says Miriam Baron, a past president of the camp's board of directors and a co-chair of the Shabbat program.

"With the help of the community, we created a shul environment in a room in the hotel," Baron says, noting that the Torah was borrowed from Winnipeg's Grey Academy and the siddurs from local synagogues.

The service itself was a typical Camp Massad Shabbat service. The Camp Massad Alumni Choir sang a number of liturgical works, many of them composed by Winnipeg's late Cantor Benjamin Brownstone, and the parshah of the week, Parah, was acted out in the form of a cooking show in biblical times.

"The hallmark of Massad is to learn from our traditions and try to modernize them," Baron says.

About 220 people attended the evening banquet, reports evening co-chair Joel Braemer. Highlights were a speech by Leona Billinkoff, who was the camp director for over 25 years, and performances by alumni David Gale (of the WTN's Loving Spoonfuls) and singer Lesley Corne. Based in Los Angeles, Corne sang excerpts from her new one-woman show, This Thing Called Love, which is scheduled to open in L.A. in the spring. Gale did his comedy routine.

The camp's yearlong celebrations will culminate Aug. 23 to Aug. 25 with a reunion at the campsite that Baron says is expected to draw alumni from far and wide. There will also be the usual Shabbat service with singing and dancing, as well as plays and songs on the Saturday evening.

"We had about 100 people for our 40th anniversary celebrations," says Braemer. "We are expecting more this time because this is a bigger event."

History made by everyone, says columnist

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish history was not made by the famous, the rich, or even the extraordinarily talented, but rather by "those who look around them, see what needs to be done, and then do it," says noted columnist and lecturer Jonathan Rosenblum.

Rosenblum is director of Jewish Media Resources, an organization whose aim is to educate the foreign media about Torah Judaism. He writes articles and editorials for The Jerusalem Post, HaModia and The Jewish Observer and has published several Art Scroll biographies, including The Vilna Gaon and Reb Shraga Feivel.

He was speaking at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill, giving the third annual Ruchama Zlotnick Memorial Lecture, which was named for a 16-year-old Beth Jacob High School student killed three years ago in a traffic accident.

No Jew, he said, has had "a greater impact on Orthodox life in Europe or North America than a seamstress in Krakow, Sarah Schenirer," who founded the first Bais Yaakov school for girls in 1918.

Schenirer realized, he said, that the fathers and brothers went away to study on Shabbat and Jewish holidays, but didn't realize that their daughters "were reading novels and going to gymnasia [state secondary schools]."

With only minimal Jewish education, no status as a single woman, and no money, she won the approval and support of the Gerer Rebbe and the Chofetz Chaim, put out signs, encouraged young girls to give lectures and eventually began the Bais Yaakov school system in approximately 1910, which, when brought to North America around the time of World War II, "transformed the world," Rosenblum said.

Other obscure but influential individuals Rosenblum cited were Yosef Rosenberger, a penniless Holocaust survivor, who invented a simple, inexpensive test for shatnes (clothes made of linen and wool, which are forbidden under Jewish law), and thus made observance of this mitzvah "part of the American reality;" second grade teacher Shmuel Avraham Misky, who started a free loan program that eventually lent over $100 million (US), all of which was repaid; and businessman Mike Tress, who bankrupted himself to help Holocaust survivors come to America.

Rosenblum urged the audience of nearly 2,000 people to realize that "you haven't failed if you didn't do all that they did." The point is, he said, to keep your eyes open to what others are going through, and to recognize how much still needs to be done.

The key to Jewish survival in these troubled times, he said, is "a reconstituted sense of Jewish unity, which is sadly lacking in Israel," as elsewhere.

That is one reason he likes coming to Toronto, he said, "the only city where I can speak to Mizrachi in the morning, and Agudah at night."

Proceeds of the event went to Tomchei Shabbos, an organization that provides food boxes for families in need on Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

Coast to Coast

Misconceptions standard in Mideast conflict

Multiple items this week:

1. In a shocking display of ignorance, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan called Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip "illegal" in his address to the Security Council on March 12. His remarks were widely reported in the media the following day.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Having fought a war of self-defence in 1967, Israel came into possession of territories which, under terms of UN Security Council Resolution 242 (1967), were to be exchanged, but only in the context of full peace and security guarantees. The extent of Israel's withdrawal was also to be subject to negotiations.

The central point is that the "land for peace" formula embodied in Resolution 242 makes Israel's presence in the territories perfectly legal under international law, pending a negotiated settlement that provides Israel with genuine peace and security. Recognition of this led veteran Israeli diplomat and UN ambassador Abba Eban to note that 242 "legitimized" Israel's presence in the territories (New York Times, June 13, 1991).

While we see frequent mention of Israel's "illegal" occupation in various media reports, we should not expect to see such a reference coming from the head of the UN. Reporting from the UN, Steven Edwards of the National Post correctly noted (March 14) that the Security Council – the only body that establishes international law – "has never used the term ['illegal'] to describe Israel's overall administration of the territories." (For further clarification, refer to the section on "242/338" in the CIC's publication "For the Record" on our Web site at www.cicweb.ca.)

2. Another widely promoted, yet common misconception is that Palestinian violence is a "justified resistance to occupation," and that if Israel were only to leave the territories it would cease. Under Resolution 242 (and 338, which binds the parties to fulfil the terms of 242), the sides are to settle their differences through negotiations, not through violence. Therefore, the Palestinians, led by Yasser Arafat, are in violation of 242 and 338. These two resolutions were the agreed-upon basis of the Oslo accords in which Arafat committed, in writing, to renounce violence and to pursue only negotiations with Israel.

But beyond that lies the depressing realization that for most of Palestinian society and the broader Arab world, the crux of the Arab-Israel conflict is not Israel's occupation (which was drawing to an end until the Camp David offers were rejected by Arafat). Rather, it is their refusal to accept the right of Jews to a sovereign country in the Middle East.

This was recently expressed in several media outlets: most eloquently, by Margaret Wente in her "Counterpoint" column in the Globe and Mail (March 9), as well as by Norman Spector in the Globe and Mail (March 12) and Gerald Steinberg on CBC Radio's "As It Happens" (March 12).

3. In his feature on how Palestinian society promotes suicide bombers as "martyrs" ("Dying for the Cause," Global's National News, March 11), Martin Himel described how the families of "suicide assailants" – the word "terrorist" is not used – receive $15,000 from Iraq and free trips to Mecca for the holy pilgrimage from Saudi Arabia, in addition to support from Hamas. However, when Himel interviewed Abdel Aziz Rentisi, a spokesperson for Hamas, viewers unfortunately did not learn what Hamas really stands for: the death of Jews and the destruction of Israel.

Diaspora's role in Israeli universities threatened

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel's universities are facing "unprecedented interference" by the government that threatens to weaken their link with the Diaspora, says the immediate past rector of Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Prof. Menahem Ben-Sasson, who completed his four-year term in the university's top academic post at the end of 2001, warned during a recent Montreal visit that Hebrew University's board of governors may be "stripped of its powers" and reduced to "overseers" if Education Minister Limor Livnat's proposals are enacted.

According to the Jerusalem Post, Livnat is recommending that the Council for Higher Education – the public body with the sole power to accredit new universities, colleges and higher-education programs – bring in new members to make it more broad-based, thereby taking control of higher education from the universities. (Until now, two-thirds of the 25-member council has been composed of university officials. Livnat's change would cut it to less than 50 per cent.)

'Unprecedented interference' by government, says former Hebrew U official

Livnat also wants two-thirds of each university's board executive committee to be composed of Israelis.

Ben-Sasson, who now teaches in the university's Institute of Jewish Studies, said in an interview that Hebrew University has appealed to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to stop the reforms from going through. The university is also making its case to Knesset members, 60 per cent of whom are Hebrew University graduates.

Since Hebrew University opened in 1925, the majority of its 250-member board of governors – about two-thirds – has been composed of people from overseas, most of them major financial supporters, and its chair has always been from abroad. (For the first time, it has an Israeli chair, Yigal Arnon, although this is a coincidence.)

Hebrew University's board of governors, which meets once a year, acts as the university's supreme administrative body, approving its budget, opening and closing its schools, listening to concerns of its faculty and students and setting its general priorities, said Ben-Sasson. (The board's executive committee meets twice annually.) It also officially bestows the degrees upon the students, he said.

Ben-Sasson is urging the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, one of its strongest per capita fund-raising arms, to support the institution in the debate.

"We could not do without the backing of our friends around the world," he said. "They provide for almost everything outside of our working budget: the physical plant, the labs, the student dormitories, the scholarships... This is a fight we can't win by ourselves."

Ben-Sasson said he fears reducing the power of the governors will dissuade many of them from taking the same interest in the university.

"Its role would essentially become meaningless, and that would be a disaster for the university," he said.

Bernard Shuster, a Canadian governor from Montreal, said many of the people on Hebrew University's board of governors are leaders in their communities and in the business world.

"They are a successful, hands-on kind of people," Shuster said. "They like to have a say where their money goes. If you take away that input, there could be financial repercussions."

Canadians have always played a strong role in Hebrew University's board of governors. The most recent Canadian chair was Ralph Halbert of Toronto. There are currently 12 full-time Canadian governors, 12 associate members and 15 honorary members (those over 75).

The Canadian Friends of Hebrew University was established in 1944, but as far back as 1925, there were Canadian supporters of the university, who associated with the American Friends, said Montreal Friends' executive-director Carolyn Steinman.

It is through the influence of the Friends organizations that the university has formed alliances with major corporations, Ben-Sasson said. In Canada, these include Bombardier, Jean Coutu, CIBC World Markets, Air Canada, Shoppers Drug Mart, the Royal Bank, Bank of Montreal-Nesbitt Burns, CanWest Global (its president, Izzy Asper, is a governor), among others.

Ben-Sasson said the proposed reforms could also lessen the emotional tie between the Israeli institution and the Diaspora.

"This is has been a true partnership," he said. "We feel our friends from abroad are family."

"The Hebrew University's slogan is, 'The university of the Jewish people,' Shuster added. "For better or for worse, all the Jewish people are not in Israel."

Ben-Sasson said he does not believe the government wants Israelis to take greater responsibility for matters traditionally in the domain of the Diaspora.

"If it ain't broke, don't fix it," he said. "I think some ministers just want to put their own stamp on things, knowing that this could be a short-term government."

'House of Hope' celebrates 10 years

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — It's been 10 years since Beth Tikvah was founded in Hamilton, and those involved are celebrating their achievements as much as the anniversary itself.

The aptly named Beth Tikvah, Hebrew for "House of Hope," offers a home with 24-hour support for individuals with developmental disabilities.

Inside, the house is much like any family home – colourful drapes, comfortable furniture and a TV in the lounge. The residents take turns with household chores, including vacuuming, doing dishes and laundry. On Shabbat, they help prepare salads and soups and set the table.

Executive director Raveen Harakh heads the team of dedicated staff who make sure the residents are happy, fulfilled and leading their lives as independently as they are able.

"Visitors comment on how well our residents function and ask why they need an environment like this," said Harakh. "Well, the reason they are so independent is because we give them well thought-out, structured support to help them succeed.

"We don't compromise on food or on staff – no one here has less than a [Bachelor's degree] in social work - and we make a conscious decision to celebrate the Jewish holidays, regardless of cost," said Harakh, who is not Jewish but has learned ritual and observance in his 10 years with Beth Tikvah.

During the week, staff members generally cook kosher meals for the household. "We are big on choices, so when it comes to menus, our clients have to approve everything. They decided to try a whole bunch of recipes to see what they liked. So we experimented to see what was popular and developed week-long meal plans that we rotate over four weeks," he said.

"There are options for what is in season or important for the holidays, and if a client doesn't like what's on the table, we offer to help them make something else."

For birthdays, the staff bake a cake with each person's favourite flavours and colours in mind, and the entrance hall is decorated – all part of making the resident feel special.

The clients are able to tap into as many activities as possible at Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre or programs such as bowling, pottery and swimming. They are often joined by four non-resident day clients whose care is also managed by Beth Tikvah staff.

The quality and personalized care offered at Beth Tikvah is the envy of visiting staff from other supported living projects in the wider community.

Kevin Teel, who has been working there since a few months after it opened, is one of the four full-time staff members "hooked on Beth Tikvah." Having worked in group homes in three provinces, he talks favourably about Beth Tikvah.

"I've worked in places where from the moment a client comes into the home, their rights disappear. Because of their disability, many residents have grown up in an environment where they are expected to be compliant and subservient

Gray gets rare honour in House of Commons

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Herb Gray was paid an unprecedented tribute in the House of Commons last week by former colleagues and adversaries alike, two months after he was dispatched from government in a huge cabinet shuffle.

The most senior Jewish politician in Canadian history was "called to the bar" of the House of Commons, a very rare privilege in which a non-parliamentarian is permitted to sit on the floor of the House and to address MPs.

It was an occasion to praise a staunch Liberal who served his country for just shy of 40 years. Speaker after speaker lauded Gray's loyalty and his devotion to public service. Some, in good-natured jest, referred to the unflappable Gray by his well-known nickname, the Gray Fog, which grew from his shrewd ability to deflect MPs' queries with the phrase, "I reject the premise of the member's question."

Gray, 70, the first Jewish federal cabinet minister and Canada's first full-time deputy prime minister, was chosen by the constituents of Windsor West in 13 straight elections, beginning in 1962, and through the terms of eight prime ministers. He held nine cabinet posts and served for a year as Opposition leader.

Some media outlets had taken Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to task for the way the House's most senior member was moved out of government.

Gray was dumped from cabinet before the House had reconvened from its winter break, precluding a proper send-off. Overnight, he went from being deputy prime minister to Canadian chair of the International Joint Commission, which monitors cross-border environmental issues between Canada and the United States. It was rumoured that he had spurned Chrétien's offer of a Senate seat.

The departing Gray was, however, awarded the title of Right Honourable, which is usually reserved for current and former prime ministers.

But there were no signs of bitterness last Wednesday following question period, when Chrétien rose to warmly praise his one-time colleague.

"He was a tough partisan fighter, and I considered it a privilege to have fought by his side," Chrétien stated. "One of the greatest pleasures of my time in the House was to watch him perform in question period, to watch the 'Gray fog' roll in and to see him defeat attack after attack. For me, he always will be the master of the forum. Indeed, I would like to ask him to name his favourite answer, but I fear that he will reject the premise of my question.

"It has been an honour for me to serve with him in opposition and in government. We all admire him and we will miss him a lot."

Opposition leader John Reynolds of the Canadian Alliance noted, tongue in cheek, that throughout his long career, Gray fielded thousands of questions, and "never actually answered a single one." Reynolds praised Gray as "a fierce opponent in the House, but always a gentleman."

NDP leader Alexa McDonough ceded her address to her party's most senior member, Lorne Nystrom, who lauded Gray's durability: "I think of Herb as the comeback kid. He was in cabinet. He was later relieved of his cabinet duties. He later came back to cabinet. He was also the comeback kid in terms of health. He came back from a serious illness [esophageal cancer] and is now fit and trim. Both these events are a tribute to his strength, perseverance and determination."

Nystrom, first elected in 1968, noted Gray's well-known love of rock'n'roll music. "He also had a sense of humour. Mind you, being a member of the Liberal government requires a sense of humour."

Bloc Québecois leader Gilles Duceppe praised Gray as a master parliamentarian and a worthy adversary.

Tory leader Joe Clark wryly said he regards Gray "as a sort of companion in charisma." Clark lauded Gray's "integrity, his strength of character, his great respect, and his understanding of the entity known as the House of Commons. These are qualities to which any parliamentarian should aspire."

Herb Gray

Finally, it was Gray's turn. He said it "was only yesterday, in 1964 [that] I met the lady who was to become my wife at a young Liberal Party reception in room 209 of the West Block." Gray's wife, Sharon Sholzberg, and his children, Jonathan and Elizabeth, were in the visitors' gallery for the occasion.

His long career, Gray said, is a reflection of Canadian ideals: He is, he said, "the first generation of his immediate family to be born in Canada. My parents came to this country from eastern Europe, from Belarus, as Jewish immigrants in search of freedoms and opportunities not available to them in the land of their birth. They found those opportunities here. Like so many other families who form part of our great Canadian family, they made a wonderful contribution and enabled me to serve my community and my country in the House of Commons and in the government of Canada in so many wonderful ways."

His Jewish heritage "inspired me in my work as a member of Parliament and as a minister. I have always been inspired by the words of the Hebrew prophets when they called out for us to do judgment and justice, when they called out for us to do judgment for the afflicted and the needy."

Gray quoted the Talmud: "One thousand years ago, a great Jewish sage said in the book of Pirkei Avot, the Sayings of the Fathers, 'Pray for the welfare of the government because without it, men would swallow each other alive.'

"These wise words are relevant today. These words are also relevant in terms of our parliamentary institutions and how they form part of government today."

Ever the parliamentarian, Gray urged the House "to continue your work... and with all Canadians so that together you will strive to seek, to find, and not to yield in building an even better Canada in a much better and peaceful world."

Beth Tikvah celebrates 10th anniversary and never to say no. And with each counsellor responsible for between three to 12 clients, it's an assembly-line approach to care."

Reflecting Beth Tikvah's more individualized approach, Teel has come in on his day off to take residents Theo and Bernie Tick out for their favourite lunch of fish and chips.

Before Beth Tikvah was founded, there was no Jewish resource in Hamilton like it. Families of people with developmental disabilities had no other option but to look to Toronto.

But Stan Tick, founder and past-president of the Beth Tikvah Foundation, was determined that his older brothers Theo, 71, and Bernie, 77, be able to stay in their home town.

"My brothers lived all their lives here Jewishly. We grew up in a kosher home and went to an Orthodox synagogue. They were not comfortable living in a non-Jewish environment and it's not what I wanted for them either," said Stan, the youngest in a family of four children.

"My parents gave up their whole lives to take care of them," Stan said. "They never had a holiday for 40 years because of family and business commitments."

Both Bernie and Theo have always needed help with everyday life skills, such as cooking, personal health care, managing money and organizing social activities, Stan said.

"They grew up in a time when the schooling available for them was really warehousing," he said. "After school, they both worked – Bernie was in a factory during the war and Theo worked for the city as a gardener.

"But today, people who function at the same level as them would have much better opportunities to become more independent, and they might have lived on their own in an apartment with help from a caregiver."

When their father died, their mother took over the responsibility, and after her death, Stan tried to keep his brothers in the family. He encountered the uncomfortable dilemma many in his situation face.

"I had my own young family at the time, and while I was lucky that I could look after my brothers financially, I couldn't care for them with the quality of life they deserved."

Unable to find suitable caregivers, Stan got his brothers into a local lodging home.

Theo takes up the story:

"I didn't like it there. The food was not nice – it was spicy so I didn't eat it. People kept walking into my room so I asked for a lock for my things but I was told, 'No, you can't: this is a lodging home,'" he said.

"The people who were supposed to be cleaning sat around drinking coffee all day, so the place was dirty, and my blanket was so filthy, it smelled like a sewer. The counsellors never helped us and I had to shave Bernie myself. Also the director would take any food brought in by my family and give it to the other residents, and the other people living there kept stealing my things to sell."

The brothers were unhappy, and so was Stan. He realized he would have to create a home for them. He began to look in an area close to the synagogues and Jewish grocery stores, and although he had never set up a foundation before, he sought help and advice, including from the Reena Foundation in Toronto, and turned to community members for help with funding.

"The late Morris Lax was our angel. He gave us an interest-free loan to buy the house I found, and I asked my friend Sheldon Frank to help me set up the board," Stan said. The vision was to provide a family setting that gave residents a happy and fulfilling life.

When Beth Tikvah opened, Theo and Bernie had to apply for a spot just like everyone else.

The original plan was to have four residents, but while the foundation waited almost three years for government funding to come through, the house needed renovations to add more bedrooms and bathrooms to accommodate the two extra residents who applied to live there.

"I knew there was a need in the community," Stan said. "Families in our situation are expected to care on our own, and tend to be insular. People also have to admit that they have relatives or loved ones that need help. We filled the gap.

"I was doing this selfishly for my brothers, but I figured that if it was good enough for them, it would be good for other people too," he said.

"At Beth Tikvah, they have everything that gives them the quality of life of ordinary people. They have a wonderful time – they go out walking, go to shul and to parties."

There have been important personal achievements too. Theo was president of the local branch of the advocacy group, People First, travelling to speak at its Canada-wide convention, as well as writing letters on disability issues to the editor of the local paper. He has also made two visits to Israel.

"Beth Tikvah is probably the most important thing I've done in the community," Stan said. "I've sat on many boards, but when you're part of something from the beginning and you see it grow – that's special."

At Kitchen Stuff Plus you can fill up a shopping bag with great stuff for your home for under $25.

Kitchen Stuff Plus, the Canadian owned and operated housewares and home fashions discount retailer, with 5 stores in the greater Toronto area, continues to attract value-conscious customers who want it all. Quality. Style. Selection. Savings. And service.

Shoppers will discover that prices are truly up to 60% less than they would expect to pay at department stores and other specialty retailers. Day in and day out. Throughout the entire store.

The stores stock a huge array of merchandise from manufacturers and distributors from around the world. Everything from cookware, glassware, flatware and tableware - to electrical appliances and kitchen utensils for virtually every culinary task imaginable, as well as specialty knives, photo frames, window treatments, candles, floor coverings, bathroom décor, storage accessories, and bridal keepsakes. Shoppers will find brand names such as Umbra, Henckels, Lagostina, Cuisinart, Proctor Silex, Black & Decker, Hamilton Beach, Tramontina, Oster, and others.

Because Kitchen Stuff Plus is able to source outstanding deals on large volumes of quality product and sell at lower than traditional margins, customers can take advantage of the stores' swift cycle of ever-changing merchandise - at everyday rock bottom prices. Kitchen Stuff Plus also custom manufactures a variety of its own private label products and, as a result, these extra savings are likewise passed along to customers.

"Our mission is to amaze and delight customers by consistently delivering exceptional value and outstanding customer service," said President, Mark Halpern. This business philosophy has differentiated us since the company's inception 9 years ago and is a strategy to which we attribute our continuing success.

Within the stores' beautiful and impeccably merchandised shopping environments, there is always plenty of highly trained, helpful staff on hand to offer friendly and knowledgeable advice, and service with a smile. Bridal & Gift Registry Service Consultants are also available to provide assistance in preparing the perfect wish list, and offer advice on how to create beautiful and affordable centre pieces and attendants' keepsakes.

Voted 'Toronto's Best Kitchen Store' five years in a row, Kitchen Stuff Plus continues to enhance its presence and recently launched an informational website (www.kitchenstuffplus.com), which features a gallery of products available at its stores, maps to all locations and a contest where visitors can win a $500 Super Shopping Spree.

HEARD THE LATEST...?

Hearing Solutions is announcing two new Toronto hearing clinics, at The Promenade Shopping Centre and at St. Clair and Avenue Road. These newest locations now mean Hearing Solutions has convenient clinics for the Toronto Jewish community from north to south.

Hearing Solutions has been serving the Toronto community for six years, with four other Toronto locations, including their North York Clinic at the Medical Building at Lawrence and Dufferin.

The full-service clinics provide for all needs under one roof. Unlike going to a doctor's office or visiting a hearing aid retailer, Hearing Solutions is equipped and staffed to allow clients to have their hearing tested at the same place they purchase their hearing aid. In addition to state-of-the-art equipment and the latest technologies in hearing aids, Hearing Solutions staff includes Registered Dispensing Audiologists and Hearing Instrument Practitioners.

Clients are seen by one of their highly qualified Audiologists, like Simon Lai and Marilyn Pike. Before joining Hearing Solutions Simon was the Director of Audiology at Baycrest Hospital, and Marilyn was Director of Audiology and Speech Pathology at the Canadian Hearing Society.

The staff at Hearing Solutions involve their clients throughout the entire process of testing and hearing aid evaluation. Clients are educated about their degree of hearing loss and their options, so they can make informed decisions.

A personal approach has made Hearing Solutions very popular in the Jewish Community in the Lawrence area. Many happy customers have recommended their service to friends and family. Now, with expanded locations, it's even easier to enjoy the sounds of life again.

AJC Foundation leader says final goodbyes

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Jack Prince arrived in Halifax in June 1939 and was told the flags waving on downtown streets were in his honour.

But Prince has been eternally grateful to Halifax and Nova Scotia, and the opportunity at age 10, to escape from Nazi-threatened Poland.

He retired recently as chair of the Atlantic Jewish Council's Foundation which allows donors to recognize their local communities through endowments. There were no flags flown but hundreds of words of commendation were uttered.

Prince, a lawyer, was raised in a typical Jewish Polish family home with life oriented on Judaic customs and laws. When he was sent to Canada to live with a cousin, that family made their home kosher, a practice Prince and his family have retained. His feeling for Judiasm, synagogue and Israel has never waned.

Prince and fund-raising have been synonymous in the Halifax and Atlantic Jewish communities.

He was the first chair of the Beth Israel Synagogue Endowment Fund, a post he held for 20 years, raising $500,000 in principal and several hundred thousand dollars in interest.

Under his direction, the Atlantic Jewish Foundation has raised several hundred thousand dollars.

Through his law practice he was instrumental in having a number of Jewish people leave substantial amounts of money to the synagogues, Israel, Atlantic Jewish Foundation and other Jewish and non-Jewish charities.

Recently, he was the sole executor of the estate of Ida Rosanne Griffin, a non-Jew who left her estate of approximately $450,000 to the United Israel Appeal, to be used for the benefit of Jewish children in Israel.

Disappointed by shrinking communities in region

Years after spending many summers as a camper and counsellor at Camp Kadimah, Prince served on the camp committee. When the camp celebrated its 50th anniversary, he and wife Barbara, raised over $110,000 to build a cultural centre.

He was a founding member of Oakfield Country and Golf Club in suburban Halifax in 1960, so Jews, unwelcome to play golf at local clubs, would have the opportunity.

He ensured that the club board incorporated a bylaw that no person could be barred as a member.

Prince and his wife established scholarships at the Hebrew University and Bar-Ilan University, as well as a bursary at Dalhousie University to enable two Black students to attend law School.

Like most Atlantic Canadians, he is frustrated to see the diminishing in size of Jewish communities in the region.

"Perhaps the only communities that have a chance to survive are Halifax, Fredericton and Moncton," he says.

"I strongly feel, particularly in Halifax, we can have a vibrant community for many decades to come if we utilize all our resources.

"We certainly have a number of young people with tremendous leadership qualifications. We do not have the wealth of the large Jewish communities but we do have sufficient funds to sustain us and to grow."

At a tribute reception, then-AJC president Victor Goldberg said, "I felt trepidation when Jack indicated to me he would step down as foundation chair, and that someone younger should take over. But he is not retreating where it counts."

He said that when funding cuts led to cutbacks in the time Rabbi David Ellis, AJC chaplain, could spend visiting smaller communities, "Jack, knowing our predicament, generously donated $24,000 to the foundation to be used for chaplaincy, a figure that will ensure the position is retained for a year or so."

Goldberg called Prince "unique in that most people of your generation step back and say they have done it. You have never taken that attitude and have been an inspiration to people like me."

Sutton Group Admiral: over 100 agents and counting

The "little company that grew" — now over 100 agents and counting — is one of the very few Cinderella stories in the hard-nosed real estate industry. Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing top agents interested in joining their team.

Murray Goldkind

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

"Fee for services" concept

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Sol Goldkind

The agents and brokers of Sutton Group Admiral Realty wish you a very Happy, Healthy, and Peaceful Passover

Teenager dies, 44 hurt, in Kfar Sava and Jerusalem attacks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An 18-year-old Israeli woman was killed and 44 civilians were injured Sunday, in two separate terror attacks in Kfar Sava and Jerusalem.

The two terrorists who carried out the attacks were killed. A third terror strike was avoided when a suicide bomber died in a "work accident," while preparing an explosive device.

Israeli security officials believe that the Fatah organization was responsible for all three attacks.

A gunman opened fire on pedestrians Sunday at 12:50 p.m. at the western entrance to Kfar Sava. Noa Orbach, a Kfar Sava resident, was killed in the attack. Another 16 persons were hurt, most of them not seriously.

The Kfar Sava police station and magistrate's court, as well as a high school are located near the scene of the attack. A number of restaurants in the area were crowded at the lunchtime hour.

Security officials identified the perpetrator of the Kfar Sava attack as a Fatah operative from the Nablus area. The terrorist might have received assistance from Hamas men in Nablus, the officials suspect.

The Jerusalem attack occurred at 2:30 p.m., at the French Hill junction in the north of the capital. Twenty-eight people were injured when a suicide bomber detonated an explosive device between a bus and a taxicab at the junction. Police spokespersons said that stepped-up deployments at the junction had forced the attacker to stay clear of its crowded central area and carry out his attack at the end of a road. Police investigations established that the explosive had been medium sized and had contained nails and other metal objects.

The French Hill attacker was subsequently identified as a resident of the nearby Bir-Naballah village. Though the Islamic Jihad organization claimed responsibility for the attack, Israeli security officials doubt the credibility of the organization's statement and suspect that Fatah was behind this second attack as well.

Some 90 minutes after the French Hill incident, a Palestinian died in an area between the village of Anata and the Givat Ze'ev neighborhood, north of Jerusalem. He was carrying an explosive device in a bag and Israeli security officials described his death as a "work accident," saying the man had apparently been a Fatah activist from the Ramallah region who had planned a suicide attack in Jerusalem.

The security officials believe that Fatah's military wing refrained from taking responsibility for Sunday's wave of attacks so as not to embarrass Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat during U.S. peace envoy Anthony Zinni's visit.

Israel braces for onslaught at the UN

— By MICHAEL JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As violence between Israelis and Palestinians has escalated over the past month, so has UN pressure on Israel.

The Palestinians, aided by their diplomatic and bureaucratic allies throughout the UN system, have stepped up rhetorical attacks from all directions against the Jewish State, say pro-Israel advocates.

And last Tuesday, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan demanded that Israel end what he described – for the first time, aides said – as "the illegal occupation."

The attacks have come even as a Saudi peace proposal gains steam and U.S. mediators lobby for a cease-fire.

Jewish observers are braced for this week's reconvening of the historically anti-Israel UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva – the first such session since the United States lost its seat last year to other western countries.

"It could be a difficult session" for Israel without its trusty defender, an American official said.

But the slew of anti-Israel resolutions anticipated at the Geneva forum will, at most, be symbolic victories that fuel the Palestinian-led campaign against Israel, observers say.

Of greater import, they say, is what happens at the UN Security Council, because of its legally binding authority. The Security Council is responsible for ensuring global peace and security.

It was in a speech to the Security Council that Annan criticized both the Israelis and Palestinians, saying he was disturbed that "escalation has been met with escalation with little – in some cases no – regard for innocent civilian lives."

But he seemed to concentrate a bit more on Israeli responsibility for the bloodshed.

Annan decried the "increasing use of heavy weaponry by Israel in civilian areas" against those "already subjected to severe physical and economic hardships."

Actions like these "further fuel the fires of hatred, despair and extremism among Palestinians," he said. "You have the right to live in peace and security within secure internationally recognized borders," he said to Israel. "But you must end the illegal occupation."

As for the Palestinians, Annan said, they "have played their full part in the escalating cycle of violence, counter-violence and revenge" and described their acts of terror and suicide bombings as "morally repugnant.

"You have the inalienable right to a viable state within secure internationally recognized borders," he said. "But the deliberate targeting of civilians is doing immense harm to your cause, by weakening international support, and making Israelis believe that it is their existence as a state, and not the occupation, that is being opposed."

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Yehuda Lancry, downplayed Annan's remarks, telling Reuters that Israel had already agreed in principle to a Palestinian state, but that negotiations were required to get there.

He was quoted as saying that Israeli forces were "compelled" to follow their strategy because of a Palestinian terrorist campaign that often did more damage than the Israeli army.

Several of the Security Council's 15 members, particularly Syria, are now said to be chomping at the bit to enter the Middle East fray – which is why many eyes are turned to the Arab summit scheduled for March 27-28 in Beirut, where the focus is expected to be on the Saudi proposal to grant Israel diplomatic relations with Arab countries in exchange for Israel's withdrawal to pre-Six Day War borders.

Depending on the summit's outcome, Palestinian supporters are expected to bring to the Security Council a resolution that will either reiterate a call to send international monitors to the disputed territories, or will demand a complete Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders – or both.

In either case, Israel will resist.

"It's not for the Security Council to resolve this conflict, but for the parties themselves," Aaron Jacob, Israel's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations, told JTA.

"The Palestinians should live up to their commitment to renounce terrorism, and resolve all outstanding issues through negotiations with Israel."

The American official, who asked not to be identified, said Washington will seek to discourage the Security Council from taking action.

"Being responsible for peace and security, there's a frustration on the part of several council members that there's this terrible violence and the council hasn't responded in a way they feel is appropriate," the official said.

"However, what we've tried to impress upon them is to let the various U.S. officials on the ground do their work. Passing a resolution is not going to do anything constructive to bring about a cessation of violence.

"At the end of the day, the only way to get a resolution is for the parties to sit down and work out their differences for themselves."

With U.S. support for Israel, no one-sided, anti-Israel resolution has much of a chance of reaching the Security Council and becoming law.

Resolutions generally make it to that level only if there is a likelihood of them passing by consensus, since the council generally prefers to appear united, say UN watchers. That is why proposed resolutions sometimes get killed before they reach the floor.

When the Palestinians succeed in winning wide backing for anti-Israel initiatives, the Americans sometimes use their veto vote to quash it.

Since the intifadah broke out in September 2000, a handful of anti-Israel resolutions have come close, but only one has passed – when the United States abstained from a vote in October 2000. Behind the current anti-Israel diplomatic activity, observers say, is a two-pronged Palestinian and Arab strategy: in the long term, an effort to "delegitimize" the Jewish State; in the short term, a renewed push to "internationalize" the conflict.

Palestinian supporters, the reasoning goes, seek to marginalize the United States in favour of a third party more sympathetic to their cause, such as the UN or European Union.

The UN is clearly preoccupied with the Palestinians, Jewish observers say, by dint of a huge Arab-Muslim bloc of member states that routinely dictates its agenda.

Over the years, in fact, a number of UN agencies have been established to address the Palestinian plight exclusively.

The Arab-Muslim bloc and other Palestinian supporters are also able to dominate various UN forums, most notably the much-touted UN World Conference Against Racism held late last summer in Durban, South Africa.

Anti-Israel forces there succeeded in inserting into a formal UN document language that painted Israel as a "racist, apartheid state" guilty of genocide and ethnic cleansing, among other crimes.

Israel and the United States walked out in protest, but the document did not die. It was adopted three weeks ago, over Israeli protests, by the UN's "Third Committee," which is responsible for social, humanitarian and cultural issues.

The final document is expected to be endorsed by the UN General Assembly this fall.

As for the future of Israeli-UN relations, it's unclear if anything can be done to rectify the perceived unfairness as long as the Arab-Muslim bloc holds sway among the membership, with no serious future prospects for reform, say Jewish observers.

UN Security Council Resolution 1397

Following is the text of a Security Council resolution drafted by the United States, "affirming a vision" of a Palestinian state and demanding the immediate cessation of all Middle East violence. It was adopted last Tuesday on a 14-0 vote, with Syria abstaining.

The Security Council,

Recalling all its previous relevant resolutions, in particular resolutions 242 (1967) and 338 (1973),

Affirming a vision of a region where two states, Israel and Palestine, live side by side within secure and recognized borders,

Expressing its grave concern at the continuation of the tragic and violent events that have taken place since September 2000, especially the recent attacks and the increased number of casualties,

Stressing the need for all concerned to ensure the safety of civilians,

Stressing also the need to respect the universally accepted norms of international humanitarian law,

Welcoming and encouraging the diplomatic efforts of special envoys from the United States, the Russian Federation, the European Union, the United Nations special co-ordinator, and others, to bring about a comprehensive, just and lasting peace in the Middle East,

Welcoming the contribution of Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah,

1. Demands immediate cessation of all acts of violence, including all forms of terror, provocation, incitement and destruction;

2. Calls upon the Israeli and Palestinian sides and their leaders to co-operate in the implementation of the Tenet work plan and Mitchell Report recommendations with the aim of resuming negotiations on a political settlement;

3. Expresses support for the efforts of the secretary-general and others to assist the parties to halt the violence and to resume the peace process;

4. Decides to remain seized of the matter.

U.S. faces Damascus dilemma

Comment

The renewed tension on Israel's northern border following last week's attack on vehicles traveling between Kibbutz Metzuba and Shlomi that killed six Israelis, has come at a very sensitive time for the Israeli-Syrian-Lebanese triangle. Jerusalem has chosen not to react to the attack, seen as the work of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah, so as not to open up a second front in the north or disrupt renewed efforts at negotiation.

Last Friday, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Anthony Zinni, special U.S. envoy to the Middle East, that Hezbollah carried out the attack, spurred on by Iran and Syria, to provoke a strong response from Israel against Lebanon and to disrupt preparations for the Arab League summit in Beirut next week. Peres believes this was the extremists' way of destroying the chances of Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah's peace proposal succeeding.

The U.S. Administration has been deliberating long and hard over its relations with Syria and is attempting to formulate a new policy. Washington's initial impression that the United States is having a hard time influencing Damascus is growing stronger, and the American messages are only partly being received by Syrian President Bashar Assad. A special team has begun examining the administration's relations with Syria, though it has yet to reach any conclusions.

Syria, Sudan and Libya, are three "borderline" Arab states that, despite their support for terrorism and their aspirations to acquire weapons of mass destruction, have been left out of U.S. President George W. Bush's axis of evil. The administration has made do with including Iraq, Iran and North Korea on its blacklist, but there are differences in its attitude toward the three: Iraq is on Bush's "to do" list – he'd like to topple Saddam Hussein's regime. The U.S. attitude to Iran has not changed much, but Bush has offered North Korea a "dialogue."

The U.S. hopes to tip the "borderline states," with Syria at the top, over to the side of the "good guys" The United States had dealings with Syria last year on two issues. The principal point of unrelenting pressure on Assad was to rein in Hezbollah and prevent a renewed conflict on the Israel-Lebanon border. The U.S. administration also had tough words on Syria's closeness to Iraq, mainly over the flowing of Iraqi oil through Syria and the smuggling of prohibited goods over the border.

Following the Sept. 11, a new channel of dialogue was opened, this one an intelligence channel, in which Syria provided America with information on the Al Qaeda network and other Islamic organizations. The CIA is very satisfied with this co-operation, but Syria has not yet changed its basic behavioural pattern. Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other Palestinian resistance groups, as well as Hezbollah, all have offices that operate openly in Damascus.

The U.S. State Department has suggested broadening the dialogue with Syria, and including incentives. Former U.S. ambassador George Djerejian visited Damascus in January, meeting with Assad, who asked for American assistance in developing the Syrian economy. Assad also told Djerejian he was ready to reach an agreement with Israel if there was also progress on the Palestinian channel. But as long as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continues, the timing is just not right.

As expected, the Pentagon's people took up a position against the State Department's "Arabists," dividing the world into the good and the bad and placing Syria on the problematic side. The Pentagon believes pressure on Syria must be increased until it stops supporting terrorism and breaks off its links with Saddam.

Israel is meanwhile trying to influence the U.S. administration not to get too close to the Syrians. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon presented the Americans with a list of demands regarding Syria, including a full withdrawal of Syrian forces from Lebanon. But Israel has in recent weeks whittled down these demands to just two key points: removing the Iranian Revolutionary forces from Lebanon and dismantling the missile and rocket systems installed by Hezbollah with Iranian help. At a later stage, Israel will also demand Hezbollah's withdrawal from the border area and for the Lebanese army to take its place.

The missile and rocket systems in Lebanon, which threaten Israeli territory in the north, have created a deterrence force that is of deep concern to the top ranks of the Israel Defence Forces and politicians in Jerusalem. U.S. pressure on Syria concentrates on managing the conflict and avoiding escalation, rather than dismantling its military might in Lebanon. The Americans have yet to decide if and how to take steps against Hezbollah, even though the organization is on its list of terror groups. Syria meanwhile continues to benefit from the administration's indecision on the issue.

South African Jews support Israel at Zionist conference

By MICHAEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Hundreds of delegates recently rallied behind Israel at South Africa's largest Zionist conference in some 20 years.

The 45th conference of the South African Zionist Federation, held 1½ weeks ago in Johannesburg, recalled the vibrant movement that played a leading role in the community until the late 1980s.

With the 80,000-strong Jewish community feeling less secure than it has for many years because of what they perceive to be the government's pro-Palestinian bias, the conference was a significant show of solidarity.

Speakers included South Africa's deputy foreign minister, Aziz Pahad; the leader of the opposition Democratic Alliance, Tony Leon; and the chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Sallai Meridor.

In his remarks, Pahad said South Africa unequivocally supported "the right of the State of Israel to exist within defined borders, in full peace and security with its neighbours."

He also said the condemnation of "any terrorist outrage committed against the civilian population of Israel" was another "immutable principle" of South African policy, which also calls for the creation of a Palestinian state.

He said the South African government has been as unequivocal in its condemnation of the military policies of the Israeli government as it has been of Palestinian terrorist attacks on Israeli civilians.

Leon, who is Jewish and married to an Israeli, said, "Too often, leading members of the government misuse my religion, or my wife's national origin, in a despicable attempt to place a bar or ceiling on my party's support."

He described a report on the Middle East issued last year by South African legislators as "outrageous," saying it "glossed over" Israel's legitimate security concerns.

"To treat the problem of Israel/Palestine simply as a matter of the illegal occupation of foreign territory and to dismiss Israel's concern for security is to wilfully misrepresent the reality. It also suggests an attachment to ideology that is much stronger than an attachment to peace," Leon said.

He said the South African government tends to characterize the Israeli-Palestinian problem as simply a matter of illegal occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and as the racist and colonialist oppression of a dispossessed and less powerful group.

"The essence of the conflict in Palestine is really very different from the conflict in South Africa," he said.

Meridor used his remarks to call on South Africa's Jews to make aliyah. Israeli officials have offered a special package of incentives for those moving to Israel from South Africa.

Many delegates at the conference signed a declaration supporting the Jewish State. Issued several weeks before the conference, it has been signed by 9,000 South African Jews.

Along the Grape Line

In every corner of Israel, across every generation, from Israel's biblical origins to the 21st century, no other product has been so savoured and sanctified. Wine is the vehicle for religious expression, social conversation and, in many cases, financial success. A winery tour of Israel could cover Israel's length and breadth, but here are just some of the wineries from which to choose.

Carmel-Mizrachi – Israel's largest winery operates two major facilities in Rishon LeTzion and Zichron Ya'acov, a quaint and historic community, south of Haifa.

Barkan – Now Israel's second largest winery, Barkan is even growing grapes in the Negev desert region. The winery is situated at Kibbutz Hulda, south-east of Tel Aviv.

Golan Heights Winery – Located in the Golan capital of Katzrin, this visit could cap a day of northern mountain touring.

Castel – A smaller winery, Castel is distinguished by its forested surroundings near Jerusalem.

Tzora – Also near Jerusalem and owned by a kibbutz, the Tzora Estate Winery produces over 4,000 cases annually. The winery store sells other products as well.

Dalton – A new winery in the Upper Galilee, Dalton is a small operation, which produces Cabernet Sauvignon, Sauvignon Blanc, Merlot and Chardonnay varieties.

Helping bereaved Jewish families at Pesach

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Passover is a time when bereaved parents feel the loss of their child more strongly, says Paul Goldstein, the president of Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario.

"You need to be good to yourself, look after your own needs and not spread yourself too thin," he said. "And you need to know it's going to be a difficult time."

Goldstein, whose daughter Shelley died almost 17 years ago at age 21, said in a phone interview that it doesn't matter whether it's been six months, six weeks or six years – the loss is always there. But the richness of life does come back, he said.

Among the services offered by Bereaved Jewish Families are family nights relating to the Jewish way of life, and eight-week self-help groups, based on the model used by Bereaved Families of Ontario. The Jewish organization was started about 13 years ago by people who wanted the type of support the larger group offered, but within a Jewish context.

The founders approached Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) at the time and, ever since, the group has been closely affiliated with JF&CS, which provides facilities and consultation. Beth Feffer, manager of JF&CS' York Region branch and herself a bereaved parent, provides supervision to group leaders, who are alumni of the self-help groups and who train with Bereaved Families of Ontario.

Participants run the gamut from Orthodox Jews to non-believers, with bereaved parents ranging from younger adults to those in their 80s. Some have lost adult children; others, infants. They died in accidents, from drug overdoses, suicide or illness. The differences don't seem to matter, said Feffer.

Initially, however, those differences caught Goldstein off-guard. When he first attended a group session as a newly bereaved parent, he thought he'd made a mistake. "I'm not ready for this," he thought. But he went back for a second session to give it one more chance. The group took him out of isolation, he said. "That was very helpful."

The members of his group bonded and continued to meet informally, in what Goldstein said is a common scenario.

"Ultimately, you do let go, usually after five to six months, or a year," said Goldstein.

The organization's executive director, Sheila Browne, whose son died in an accident more than 20 years ago, says simply that the self-help group saved her life.

It's true that groups are not for everyone, she said. "I hear it all the time – 'I'm not a group person.' But some people don't want to leave.' "

Some parents may need more than a self-help group can offer, noted Goldstein. "Some need professional help, but quite often they get all they need to try and live their lives normally [from the self-help group]."

Goldstein and his wife once again enjoy the "fullness and richness of life" and take great joy in their grandchildren, he said, although there is also "a certain emptiness."

Having led groups with Bereaved Families of Ontario before the Jewish group was formed, Goldstein said that in helping others, he found that he helped himself.

But, as Feffer noted, potential leaders need to have had "a fair bit of time" after their loss.

The non-profit organization, which both receives community funding and raises funds itself, is involved in community projects that help others – funding sessions at summer camp for Jewish children who have lost a parent or who have a seriously ill parent, for example. Currently they are refurbishing a room in the emergency area of the Hospital for Sick Children.

They have also planted memorial trees and a rose garden at Earl Bales Park. "People feel they've done something in memory of their child, and it's a community effort that says they're part of the community," said Feffer.

In early May, the organization will hold a reunion for the more than 100 self-help group alumni. The evening, which is open to the public, will run as one of the group's family nights at Adath Israel Congregation. Ann Finkbeiner, Baltimore-based author of After the Death of a Child: Living With Loss Through the Years, will speak at the event.

New health series at Nadal JCC

TORONTO — Living well just got easier with a new series of free public education sessions on fitness, nutrition and health care, entitled Living Well, to be offered at the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

"This is a new age of health and wellness service delivery. I am very excited about the prospects for our membership and the local community," said Bill Emery, executive director, of the Nadal JCC.

The Nadal JCC and Mount Sinai Hospital will present several sessions on nutrition, as well as a session on breast health care and other talks on women's health issues, including menopause, osteoporosis and women in the weight room.

"This partnership enables us to share our expertise and promote healthy living in the community," says Joseph Mapa, Mount Sinai's president and CEO.

"After all, the key to good health is through health promotion and education."

The first session, on women in the weight room, takes place March 23, while the second, on nutrition, runs March 25. The remaining six sessions run through to June. Summer and fall sessions are being planned.

For more information contact: Alison Lee, Nadal JCC fitness and recreation manager, at 416-924-6211.

Miles Nadal JCC was built in 1953 on the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue and has been the focal point of the downtown Jewish community ever since. Through athletics, education and health programs, cultural arts and community service, the JCC touches the lives of more than 100,000 people every year.

Founded in 1923, Mount Sinai is affiliated with the University of Toronto and recognized internationally for excellent patient care, teaching and research.

Songwriting is therapeutic for 19-year-old

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — What do you do if you're a budding singer/songwriter and just broke up with someone you considered your soulmate?

Make a CD based on your experience, of course. That's exactly what Aubrey Stork, 19, did after breaking up with his girlfriend of four years.

"It definitely was very therapeutic for me," Stork says. "I'd gone through some hard times and wanted to create something that everybody can relate to. Anybody from young teens to 100-year-olds can relate to it."

Aubrey Stork

His CD, Metaphor of Life, contains 12 songs written last summer just two months after his breakup. The lyrics read like pages from a diary and go through the ups and downs of his emotional rollercoaster.

"The songs are based around a long-term relationship that I had and the politics that are involved," he says. "It's about how it affected me emotionally."

Despite his youth, Stork's lyrics aren't your typical "boy meets girl, boy loses girl" bubblegum pop. They indicate a mature introspection, and are more a collection of emotional thoughts and responses than a simple chronology.

"We're still friends," he says about his ex. "Naturally, I spoke to her before releasing it. She felt a little awkward but was OK with it. She understood where I'm coming from."

He says he's been listening to a lot of The Doors, Bob Dylan, CSNY and similar '70s acts recently and it shows. The songs on Metaphor of Life are stripped down blues-folk acoustic guitar and vocals with a bit of harmonica. Many have strong melodies and vocal harmonies. At times I'm reminded of The Beatles' Across the Universe.

The CD also contains a segment that, when played in a PC, allows you to read the stories behind the songs.

Stork, who recently graduated from Toronto's Harris Institute for the Arts' recording arts management program, started playing the guitar when he was 12 and realized quickly that, for him, "there's no other place than being on stage." With his youth and drive, he said he hopes to become a full-time musician and artist manager.

To this end, Stork created his own label, Purple Flag, and released Metaphor of Life. If all goes well, he'd like to start releasing other bands' music on his label as well.

"My ultimate goal is to make a living in what I love to do--playing and writing songs," he said. "I don't need to be a rock star, just make a living at it."

Stork plays in and around the city a few times a month. His next gig is April 26 at the Vox Restaurant & Bar, 474 Adelaide St. East, at 11 p.m.

You can find Metaphor of Life in many CD stores around Toronto or by visiting Stork's Web site at www.acousticaubrey.com.

NORMAN LEVINE WINS $20,000 WRITERS' TRUST MATT COHEN AWARD

Canadian short-story writer Norman Levine recently won a prestigious literary prize – the Writers' Trust of Canada's Matt Cohen Award – in honour of a lifetime of writing. The prize, established more than a year ago by the Writers Trust and a group of anonymous donors, consists of a cash award of $20,000.

Levine, who is 79, lives in England and does not have a phone. He was not at the awards ceremony to receive his prize, which a Writers' Trust spokesperson describes as a "lifetime achievement award." The recipient is chosen by committee and writers can't apply for it. Mavis Gallant was the inaugural winner.

Levine has published two novels, but he is best known for short-story collections such as From a Seaside Town (1970), Thin Ice (1979), Champagne Barn (1984) and Something Happened Here (1991). His most recent collection, By A Frozen River, was published by Key Porter last fall.

Patsy Aldana, the widow of writer Matt Cohen, read a citation explaining why Levine was chosen for the prize. She explained that he has long been better known in Europe than in Canada and that many of his stories were published in German before they appeared in English. Further, she noted that his travel book, Canada Made Me, appeared in England two decades before it was published in Canada.

"In presenting Norman Levine with this award, we hope in part to redress that imbalance," she said. "For there is no doubt that Norman Levine is one of the most accomplished and important writers that Canada has made."

Mamet Play: The East West Theatre Company presents The Old Neighbourhood, a play by Pulitzer-prize winning playwright David Mamet that features a middle-aged Jewish character in the lead role.

After his marriage breaks up, Bobby Gould returns to his old neighbourhood and looks up his former girlfriend as he struggles to find out which way his life should turn. The play opened to good reviews on Broadway in 1997 and in London in 1998.

The Toronto cast includes Wayne Ward, Kathyrn Winslow and Rae Ellen Bodie; the director is John Gordon. Artword Theatre, 75 Portland St. $27 - $22. April 11 to 28. 416-366-7723.

Hope and Heroes: Barry Shainbaum is a Toronto-based commercial photographer who "shoots from the heart." His book, Hope and Heroes: Portraits of Integrity, offers inspiring portraits of 47 people from all walks of life, including Dr. Helen Caldicott, Uri Geller, Jane Goodall, Rick Hansen, Nelson Mandela, Bonnie Raitt and Martin Sheen. Biographical profiles, based on interviews, were written by Madelaine Palko and Shannon Fitzgerald, and Uri Geller has supplied the foreward.

Book on Nazi Imagery: The recent exhibition "Mirroring Evil: Nazi Imagery/Recent Art" at New York's Jewish Museum presents works of art that use Nazi and concentration camp images in unsettling ways, with the result that many Jewish commentators have been sharply critical of the show and the Jewish Museum.

Together with the museum, Rutgers University has published a catalogue of the exhibition that includes a series of essays on various related artistic, ethical and historical issues. The book Mirroring Evil: Nazi Imagery/ Recent Art is edited by Norman L. Kleeblatt and is distributed in Canada by Scholarly Books, 416-504-6545.

Sure it's not Shlomo?

TORONTO — Renowned scholar-musician Rabbi Moshe Shur, the Jewish minstrel otherwise known as the Rockin' Renaissance Rabbi performs on Saturday evening, April 13, at 9:00 p.m., the climax of the Chassidic Shabbaton at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Shlomo Shur

Rabbi Shur, who founded the Diaspora Yeshiva Band, is Director of Queens College Hillel Foundation in New York. He has sung worldwide, entertaining audiences of all ages with his melodies and stories throughout the United States, Canada, the Caribbean, Israel, Australia and New Zealand.

Tunes by the Grateful Dead, Bob Dylan and other rock artists serve as background for lyrics that express the Jewish soul.

On April 13, you have the opportunity to join the growing number of synagogues that are incorporating the soulful spirit of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach into their services and programs. You will leave with a "feel good" feeling.

The concert is at 1700 Bathurst Street, 3 blocks south of Eglinton Ave. General Admission is $15 ($18 at the door), Seniors & Students: $7 ($10 at the door). Tickets are available through the synagogue office. For information call 416-781-3511.

Play combines humour and violence

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Young Russian Jews who live in Toronto or even those who come on an extended visit have a rough time in Canada.

Misha, a one-act play by Adam Pettle at the Buncha' Young Artists Festival, makes this point strongly.

Inspired by the death of Matti Baranovski, the play combines humour and violence.

After an argument over a pack of cigarettes, Misha, played by Daniel Stemer, is murdered in Simon Park, by Aaron (Jacob Barker), an Israeli soldier visiting Toronto.

Misha's best friend Max, a Canadian, (Miklos Perlus) is with Misha in the park where the attack takes place, but he runs away, plagued by guilt.

After the murder, Max looks back at the relationship between the boys and the difficulties they have faced.

In a series of scenes that Max recalls, we learn that he is not the only one who has had to run. "I don't want to go on any longer. I'm tired of running all the time," Misha says at one point, relating his difficulties in the early grades of high school when he was snubbed by other students because of his accent, and had to eat alone, till one day Max joined him because his regular lunch mate was away.

Max recalls experiences the boys shared. One plot element, for example, describes Max's attempt to help Misha have a sexual encounter. Max makes arrangements for Misha to spend the night with his sister. In his excitement over the coming event, Misha asks Max a lot of questions indicating that this is his (Misha's) first experience, but he is killed two nights before the weekend tryst is to take place.

Max and Misha converse on swings in Misha.

In another of Max's recollections, Misha is preparing for his bar mitzvah, even though he is 17, because his family could not afford one in Poland when he was 13. He has grave doubts about whether he can learn his part in the ritual, but Max encourages him. Misha's murder takes place before the scheduled date of the bar mitzvah.

In another scene, Aaron, his killer, hugs Misha and discovers that their grandfathers were born and lived in the same Russian village.

Aaron also complains about discrimination in Toronto against Russian Jews.

The set is quite bare. The actors make some of their exits and entrances swinging by their arms from bars erected across the top of the stage, and several of the conversations between Max and Misha take place as they sit side by side on swings.

Max also criticizes the Toronto Jewish scene; he complains that a ticket is needed to enter a synagogue and says Jewish adults are living "vacuum" lives. Max survives at the end of the play, with the aid of vodka, pills and a therapist of whom he makes fun. Still the guilt prevails and he continues to think that he should have prevented his friend's death.

"Why didn't I do something?" Max wails near the end of the play. "I've asked myself 100 times."

The young audience of students at the afternoon performance that I attended appreciated Pettle's efforts, particularly his shafts of humour, which while critical of the estabishment, were not anti-Semitic.

The play is in reportory with Martian Summer by Nathalie Boisvert until March 23 at Theatre Passe Muraille Backspace. Call 416 504-7529 for information.

Mayumana brings dancer back home to Canada

Show combines music and dance

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Mayumana, the Israeli rhythmic theatrical spectacular comes to the Elgin Theatre next month, it will be a homecoming of sorts for one of its cast members.

Tel Aviv-based dancer and choreographer, Una Holbrook, 31, called Canada home for many years – living in Prince Edward Island from kindergarten through high school. She also studied at Toronto's prestigious National Ballet School of Canada.

"We know Toronto audiences go to see a lot of shows and I personally feel they are going to appreciate our show," says Holbrook, who uses "Una" as her stage name, in a phone interview from Israel. "We are starting to feel the buzz here because it is our North American premiere.

"We hear the Elgin is a lovely theatre and Toronto is a very exciting place. I have good memories from studying in Toronto. I am especially excited about coming because I'm still in contact with my friends in Canada – I'm looking forward to them coming to see the show."

Mayumana, pronounced my-you-mah-nah, is derived from Meyumanut, a Hebrew word meaning "skilled."

The show combines elements of music, dance and performance art, fusing the rhythm with humour and movement.

Eylon Nuphar and Boaz Berman, who both perform in the 10-member cast, created Mayumana in 1996. They've have taken the show throughout Europe and to South America. The 70-member troupe now boasts its own theatre in Tel Aviv and there are plans to open a second one in Holland. Before the troupe's North American debut in Toronto, Mayumana will be touring China.

"It is a very exciting show. I describe it as more of a circus with so many elements. It is a melting pot of styles and people, based on rhythm. It's a very positive show full of joy of life. Mayumana takes you on a journey," Una says.

"The performers who come from all over the world have different backgrounds in the arts. Of course, my background is dance, but I still get to do other things like drum and some acting. Someone from a musical background's emphasis is more on the music, but they still dance in the show."

Una believes the show has international appeal because there is no language, except one number with a small amount of text that is translated into the language of the country where the troupe is performing, to help make a connection with audiences.

Una says Mayumana can be therapeutic for an Israeli audience, especially in the current political climate. "You can't ignore the situation," she says. "It pushes us more to spread good energy. We feel we do that in Tel Aviv and abroad. You really feel that people enter our world when they come into the theatre to watch our show and forget about everything for an hour-and-a-half – the audience and us, alike."

Born in Portugal, the Holbrook family moved around – landing in Prince Edward Island when Una's father, a professor, accepted a position there when Una was five years old. After her high school graduation, Una moved with her parents to Israel, where some of her extended family already lived.

Una enrolled at the Rubin Academy of Dance and Music. After graduation, Una went to study in New York, Vienna and Paris, where she was able to combine her ballet training with the African, hip hop and jazz rhythms she found so appealing.

She split her time performing with various dance companies and teaching dance throughout Israel until she auditioned for the original cast of Mayumana, along with 700 other hopefuls.

"One of the nice things about Mayumana is it offers endless opportunities," she says. "I also teach within the company. I see myself performing for another good few years. Hopefully, I'll stay in the company after I retire, whether it is in teaching or whatever."

Mayumana runs April 2 to 14 at the Elgin Theatre, 189 Yonge St. Call Ticketmaster 416-872-5555.

Una (at right) returns to Canada with the cast of Mayumana.

Russian returns from Salt Lake with hockey bronze

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Viacheslav (Slava) Fetisov is one of the most respected men in Russian hockey, so when he calls asking for help in putting together the country's Olympic team, there aren't many Russians who will turn him down.

Certainly not Igor Kuperman, who's known Fetisov since both were rookies more than 20 years ago breaking into the hockey business – Fetisov as a defenceman with the Red Army and Soviet national teams, Kuperman as hockey editor with Sports Games Magazine, a Moscow-based periodical.

Kuperman was flattered to receive Fetisov's call last August and didn't think twice before agreeing to help. After clearing it with his employers, the Phoenix Coyotes (Coyotes part-owner Wayne Gretzky told him to "go for it"), Kuperman signed on as assistant general manager of the Russian Olympic team.

It was a stressful, yet rewarding experience that Kuperman had hoped would produce a golden ending. Like the executives charged with assembling the Canadian team, the Russians faced lots of pressure from a hockey-mad nation that expected to win.

Even more, the Russians had to contend with domestic political intrigues that festered and grew and finally had to be resolved in the Kremlin.

It took the personal intervention of Russian President Vladimir Putin to cut through the country's byzantine hockey politics and choose Fetisov to head the Olympic team, over national team coach Boris Mikhailov, a one-time national team star and a throwback to the old school, autocratic Soviet era.

As a result of that late decision, the Russian team missed the September warm-up camp that most other top contenders enjoyed. That was "a huge disadvantage" and proved costly for team cohesion, Kuperman said.

Feeling they started a step behind the opposition, the Russian management team got into gear early in the NHL season. Kuperman threw himself into his new task with gusto, watching a lot of games and scouting potential national team players.

Fetisov, who took on the dual roles of coach and general manager, also assigned Kuperman plenty of administrative tasks – everything from having people meet the players at the Salt Lake airport to sorting out the on-ice number assignments.

Kuperman, who is director of hockey information for the Coyotes, also handled public relations and media contacts for the Russian team.

As he described the player selection process, echoes of the Canadian experience were apparent. Beyond the obvious question of talent, management wanted to pick "someone you could rely on, who would play well, play hard and give all efforts on the ice," Kuperman said. "In previous years, some players did not play hard enough for the Russian national team."

Two key defencemen, Sergei Zubov and Alexei Zhitnik, turned down invitations "for personal reasons."

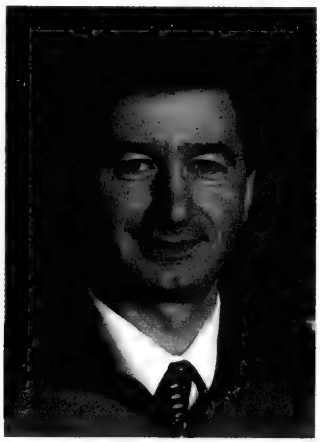
"You cannot make them play if they don't want to. Canada came without one of the best goalies in the world [Patrick Roy]. The team comes first," he said.

At any rate, "there were so many candidates, it was difficult to pick the right ones."

Once the team was selected in December, Kuperman, who worked for the Winnipeg Jets before moving with the team to Phoenix, turned to scouting opposition players, reporting his findings to Fetisov.

Based on what he saw, he predicted Canada, the United States and Russia would vie for the top three medals.

While hockey fever was building in Canada, much the same was taking place in Russia, where the sport ranks just behind soccer in popularity. At the Winter Olympics, it's by far the biggest sport for Russians, far ahead of figure skating or other ice and snow pursuits.



Igor Kuperman

"It was a huge thing for the entire country," Kuperman explained. "The game against the Czechs, even though it was broadcast late at night, 50 per cent of the country watched it and they went nuts when we won."

The team's next game, an elimination contest against the powerful American squad, still puzzles Kuperman and the rest of the Russian brain trust.

Russia fell behind 3-0 after two periods as the team seemed disinterested in competing with the fast-skating Americans. They made a game of it in the third, coming on strong but losing 3-2.

The first two periods "are hard to explain," Kuperman said. "Maybe they were nervous... They didn't look good for two periods but they did in the third."

After, he talked to the players about it, but "no-one gave me an explanation why. They didn't know."

The Russians' third period resurgence came after Fetisov used the between period break to appeal to their pride. His speech was delivered in a calm and "polite" manner. There was no paint-blistering diatribe as suggested by some broadcasters.

"He just said, we have to hold our heads up high and we can't lose the game like that. And the players began to play better," Kuperman said.

Afterward, "the mood was really bad. We lost the world, so it was really bad."

Nevertheless, the team rebounded and handled Belarus easily in the bronze medal game. As a team executive, Kuperman received a bronze medal – not the one given the players, but a smaller version issued by the International Ice Hockey Federation.

Putting on his fan's hat, Kuperman called for removal of the red line. What's more, he said, "I wish for more international competition at the top level, because it's great and it's fun."

Unfortunately, the format of the tournament can be unfair to good teams, like Sweden, which lost to Belarus in an upset but would beat Belarus 99 times out of 100, he said.

The Canadians, he noted, "are always Canadian. They're always really good, very strong... The team that played the best won."

As for Kuperman's own Olympic experience, it can be boiled down to lots of hard work and plenty of stress. Other than the rink, the hotel and the athletes' village, he didn't see much of the Games.

Though he wouldn't trade his Olympic memories for anything – he's proud of his bronze medal and feels "it's a huge honour" to have been part of the Russian team – nothing beats success. "I just wished we'd have won and restored Russia as a superpower of hockey," he said.

Hapoel Tel Aviv shocks AC Milan

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hapoel Tel Aviv's amazing UEFA Cup run continued last week with a dramatic 1-0 win over favourites AC Milan in their quarterfinal first leg.

The match was moved to Nicosia after UEFA, the European soccer federation, ruled that Israel was too dangerous a venue for international games during the current volatile security situation.

Helicopters hovered overhead with search lights scouring the stadium and its surroundings, as more than 1,000 police and undercover units ensured security at the game.

A goal in the 32nd minute by diminutive Moldovan striker Sergei Clescenco, who volleyed in from an acute angle on the left from a Yossi Abuksis corner, undid Milan, the five-time European champions.

Hapoel is the first Israeli club ever to reach this stage in the UEFA Cup. So far, Hapoel has eliminated top European teams Chelsea (England) and Parma (Italy).

Nearly 500,000 Israelis – 34 per cent of the television audience – watched the game on television.

Milan applied plenty of pressure, but Hapoel soaked it up with a confidence that belied their underdog status.

The Italians' best chance came in the 54th minute when Massimo Ambrosini's header was brilliantly parried away by Hapoel goalkeeper Shavit Elimelech, who played another excellent game.

Hapoel's red victory banners dominated the front pages of Israel's newspapers, and Ma'ariv and Yediot Achronot gave the item precedence over headlines about war and politics.

Ma'ariv reported that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had been so proud of Hapoel's triumph he interrupted talks with visiting U.S. peace envoy Anthony Zinni to tell him the result.

The second leg will be played in Milan this week.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

It seems that lately my best friend no longer has any time for me. She is very involved in extra-curricular activities at school and has made a new group of friends with whom she spends lots of time on the weekends. Things we used to do, such as sleepovers and seeing movies, have become less frequent and when we do make plans, she is constantly cancelling on me. It's almost as if I have been replaced by her new friends. I wish she still needed me.

I'm not sure what caused this change, but I miss her and would like things to go back to the way they used to be. What do you think I should do?

Lonely

Dear Lonely,

You need to discuss this situation with your friend. Find a time when she's alone and won't be distracted and explain to her how you feel. It's likely that she feels the same way, and she'll be glad you're taking that initiative.

Try to make plans with her ahead of time. This way you'll be able to find a time you're both free and if something comes up you'll have a chance to reschedule. Also, it may help if you try and get to know some of her new friends. Ask her if you can all do something together. This way you'll become a part of her new life. This will make it easier for your friend, because she won't have to divide her time.

You need to understand that people change and they do grow apart. Maybe it's for the better that you and your friend are spending more time apart. This will give you a chance to meet new people and have your own new group of friends. Take your friend's lead and get involved in your school. Write an article for the school newspaper or join student council. The busier your life is, the less time you'll have to spend missing your friend.

Remember, just because things are tough time now, it does not mean you should give up. A true friendship will be able to overcome any problem.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Put Your Money Where Your Heart Is

A New Philanthropic Vision

UJA FEDERATION — Jewish Toronto, Tomorrow

Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund - Toronto One

As times change, so too do the challenges facing the Jewish community.

With the onset of the new millennium, many Jews have been blessed with an abundance of financial wealth. The challenge is creating financial connections between today's generation and the organized Jewish community.

One of the categories for JVPF's concept proposals is Jewish education & tolerance.

With that wealth comes the responsibility of cultivating passionate, committed, informed, and motivated Jewish leaders who will capitalize on it.

"Partners will offer their expertise to guide the recipient of the funds."
- Ken Tanenbaum,
Chair, JVPF-Toronto One

That is where the Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund (JVPF) - Toronto One comes in.
Only in its infancy, Toronto One has already begun to attract young Jewish architects of change who are committed to the Jewish mission of Tikun Olam, repairing and improving the world, by responding to important Jewish causes that need a helping hand.

Toronto One will lift Jewish children from poverty.

"We want to fund projects with the potential to deliver extraordinary benefits with a very modest investment."
- David Lawee,
Chair, JVPF-Toronto One

The mission of JVPF-Toronto One is simple; to identify and fund initiatives which have a significant impact on the quality of Jewish life and reinvigorate existing Jewish institutions. A similar fund in Washington undertook projects such as a HesedMobile - a specially equipped van that delivers food, fuel, blankets, books and medical equipment to Jews in small towns and villages in Eastern Ukraine. Toronto One will also provide the "Partners" with a unique personal education about a myriad of social issues, while giving each investor the chance to network with a group of like-minded entrepreneurs.

Family services and the elderly are one of the focuses of the JVPF initiative.

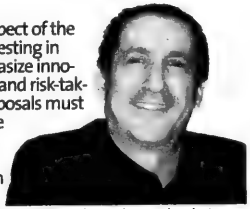
Toronto One has raised over $250,000 from more than 25 Partners and their spouses. These Partners

"This initiative gives its Partners the chance to excel in the non-profit world, as they have professionally."
- Mark Waldman,
Chair, JVPF-Toronto One

will then have the opportunity to put their heads... and their hearts together to identify, prioritize, and fund initiatives of their choosing. Partners and their spouses will be encouraged to then play a proactive role in the philanthropic investment process.

An important aspect of the philosophy is investing in ideas that emphasize innovation, creativity and risk-taking. Concept proposals must fit into one of the three following categories: Jewish education and tolerance; poverty, and elderly and family services.



Dr. David M. Elcott, Ph.D. author, lecturer, and organizational consultant recently brought his insights regarding Jewish life to a meeting of JVPF Toronto One.

Participation in Toronto One requires a $10,000 investment. This is a one-time commitment, and there is no obligation to make additional contributions. In successive years, the fund may be recapitalized, and other philanthropic venture funds may be created.

For more information about the UJA Federation Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund, call Debby Kassoy at (416) 631-5737

The Chairs of Toronto One: Making it Happen!

The multi-faceted David Lawee holds a BA from the University of Western Ontario, a law degree from McGill University, and an MBA from the University of Chicago. Lawee is Chief Operating Officer of OpenCola Inc., an internet software company recognized as one of the 25.Coolest Companies for 2001. "I became involved in the JVPF to make a difference," says Lawee. "Not just in the way we raise money, or how we deploy it, but in the way we think about philanthropy and the organizations that deliver it."

Ken Tanenbaum - a graduate of the prestigious Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania, Ken is an active member of Toronto's Jewish community.

Ken sits on many boards, including Chairman of Mothers Against Drunk Driving; Vice Chair and Past Co-Chair, UJA Federation Atid Program. He is Vice President of Business Development with Lafarge Construction Materials.

Mark Waldman is Vice President of Strategic Planning and Business Development of Marnlen Management, a family holding company that owns Sandylion Sticker Designs, a popular children's novelty sticker company, and Labelad, a custom label manufacturer. "The JVPF gives people the opportunity to be more strategic and directed with the money they give," says Waldman. "It also gives the opportunity for more creativity and dynamic ideas."

One of the traditional sounds of Passover is the sweet crunch of the matzah. This young girl from the former Soviet Union was crunching away for the first time in her new home in Jerusalem. [UIA Federations Canada/Robert A. Cumins photo colourized by Britta Montgomery]

Compelling truths of Jewish life in 2002

Editorial

It is one of the melancholy contradictions of the upcoming Pesach holiday, – indeed, of the tear-soaked pages of Jewish history, – that a photo of a sweetly innocent young girl munching on a piece of matzah must share the same page as that of two grief-stricken mourners clinging to each other for comfort at the funeral of a friend.

Yet both scenes depict a compelling truth about Jewish life in the year 2002 that we must strive to understand even as we strive to combine them into the defining context for the holiday this year.

The matzah in the little girl's hand is the chief symbol of the very essence of the holiday: the poor person's bread, prepared in haste, that our forebears ate on their road to freedom.

And the little girl, of course, is the very embodiment of one of the key reasons we celebrate the holiday: to embed deep within the generational structure of our people, the memory of the Exodus.

As Gil Troy notes on this page, "the power of the seder… comes from its ritualization of memory."

Typical of their wise and loving ways, the ancient rabbis ordained that our children would be involved in every aspect of the seder.

The questions, the singing, the hermeneutics, the rhymes and the abundant, good food were all designed to engage the curiosity of our children.

Remember the victims at the seder

By GIL TROY

During this year's seders, we will celebrate our joyous holiday of liberation with heavy hearts. Even as we revel in our freedom as Jews in the modern world, our brothers and sisters in Israel are in pain.

In the 17 months since the Palestinians turned away from negotiations toward violence, too many have died, too many have been injured, on both sides. And too many seders will have empty chairs – missing husbands, fathers, brothers, sons; missing wives, mothers, sisters, daughters.

The power of the seder – which remains one of the most popular of Jewish ceremonies – comes from its ritualization of memory. It is a most primal, most sensual, most literal, of services. The seder – with its representations of the mortar used in building, the charoset, and of the tears shed by the slaves, the salt water – helps us visualize the trauma of slavery.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Shul Fund-raiser

TORONTO — Entertainers from the Kensington Market area and beyond will hold an April 7 concert to help raise funds to repair the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, which was damaged by arson March 11. The concert will be held at 8 p.m. at Holy Joe's (651 Queen St. W) and will feature a variety of performers, including Michael Savona, Michael Paoli's Hasid Jazz, Noah Zacharin, Andrea Fields, Shauna Major & Friends, Liad Twena, Audiobomb, Superhalo and King Frisky. Call 416-926-1966 ext. 262 for details.

ISRAEL

New Chief Rabbi

TEL AVIV — Rabbi Shlomo Amar, head of the Petach Tikvah Rabbinical Court, was elected chief rabbi of Tel Aviv last week. He is the first sole chief rabbi of the city, following a decision by the municipal council to abolish having two chief rabbis, one Ashkenazi and one Sephardi. Rabbi Amar was elected by a body of 30 local officials. He was unopposed.

Cabinet Resignations

JERUSALEM — The resignations of Tourism Minister Binyamin Ayalon and Infrastructure Minister Avigdor Lieberman went into effect March 14. The pair quit after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lifted a siege on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

WORLD

Cemetery Attacked

BERLIN — Police are investigating whether last week's homemade grenade attack that damaged the courtyard of a Jewish cemetery was the work of Arab terrorists or right-wing fanatics. The Simon Wiesenthal Centre said police should look at ties between German neo-fascists and Mideast extremists.

Latvian SS

RIGA — Some 600 people gathered here recently to mark the 59th anniversary of the creation of a Latvian Nazi SS unit. The commemoration angered Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Jerusalem office, who argued that those who fought alongside Hitler's forces should not feel proud of themselves.

New Youth Group

LISBON — The Jewish community here has established its first youth group. Children and young adults aged four to 25 will gather for cultural and sports events through Dor Chadash, as well as group discussions. An Israeli dance group is also being formed.

Blast Marked

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews and Israeli officials marked the 10th anniversary of the bombing of the Israeli Embassy here last week. A siren sounded and relatives of the victims spoke during the ceremony commemorating the attack, which is still unsolved. Twenty-nine people were killed and more than 200 injured in the March 17, 1992 blast.

Kosher Ban

BERN — Switzerland will not ease a law that bans kosher slaughter of animals. The decision by the Swiss government was made after consulting with Swiss Jewish representatives, a government spokesperson said. The government also told Jewish leaders that it would guarantee the continued import of kosher meat. Sources say fear of a possible anti-Semitic backlash forced the government's hand. Swiss Jewish leader Alfred Donath called the law discriminatory.

Re-Trial Moved

NEW YORK — The re-trial of a U.S. rabbi accused of contracting to kill his wife will be moved in an attempt to hold a fair hearing. Judge Linda Baxter said the re-trial of Fred Neulander would be moved to another county in New Jersey. The first trial ended in a hung jury. Neulander is accused of having his wife, Carol, killed in 1994 so he could pursue an affair.

Passover Kits

NEW YORK — More than 2,000 Jewish U.S. military personnel stationed around the world received seder kits for Passover. The Jewish Community Centers Association of North America shipped kits containing kosher-for-Passover matzah, soup, gefilte fish, grape juice and Haggadahs.

Poll: Canadians Neutral On Mideast

TORONTO — Almost half of Canadians say they support neither side in the Mideast conflict, a new poll says.

Only 16 per cent of Canadians expressed support for Israel, and 12 per cent supported the Palestinians, according to the poll of 1,000 Canadians, conducted by Ipsos-Reid for the Globe and Mail and CTV and released earlier this month.

Seventeen percent of respondents supported both sides.

The poll, conducted from March 12-14, asked, "As you know, there has been increasing tension and violence in Israel in recent weeks. Based on whatever you've seen or heard about the current conflict in Israel, generally speaking, which side do you, yourself, tend to support more?"

Forty-eight per cent said they supported neither side.

Support for Israel was strongest in British Columbia (25 per cent), followed by Alberta (21 per cent), Atlantic Canada (19 per cent), Ontario (18 per cent) and Saskatchewan and Manitoba (12 per cent).

Palestinian support was strongest in Quebec (18 per cent), followed by Ontario (13 per cent) and British Columbia and Alberta (both at nine per cent).

Toronto Jews rally to support Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel desperately needs to feel the type of support shown Sunday at a solidarity rally attended by more than 2,000 people at Mel Lastman Square.

That was the message brought by Yuli Edelstein, Israel's deputy minister of immigrant absorption, to a crowd ranging from babes in arms to seniors. Participant Shirley Margel, who would otherwise have been preparing for a seder and two Passover meals with her children and grandchildren, said it was "definitely more important" to be at the rally. "I'll have one cake less," she said.

Many supporters waved large Israeli flags and held placards supporting Israel and decrying terrorism.The event, which was preceded by a spirited youth rally, was one of hundreds held throughout North America. It was organized by Toronto's Israel Now Consortium – a network of more than 100 community organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Consulate General of Israel.

"I come here from a country at war," said Edelstein, who flew in from Israel for the day. In the past year and half, he noted, Israel has suffered one terrorist attempt or attack per hour.

The former Soviet refusenik, who made aliyah in 1987, spoke of Israel's sense of loss, bewilderment and despair, but also of its renewed unity and resolve in the face of what he called "a war unlike any other except maybe the War of Independence 54 years ago."

This is not a war over territory, settlements or Palestinian self-determination, said Edelstein. "This is a war for our survival. At stake is our existence as a sovereign nation."

In light of that, Israel "dare not" concede territory, dismantle settlements or sanction violation of agreements, he said.

"We did not wait 2,000 years to give up

Into the corridor, with song

From the editor desk

Most of his life the tailor sang songs in minor keys. The melodies sprang from the traditions and the folkways of his home, which, in the first two decades of his life, had been in a small village at the end of a dirt road little travelled in eastern Poland.

In later years, he would test the range and power of his voice with other kinds of song. When he was alone, working at his sewing machine, he would sing like a tenor at La Scala.

In his prime, the young man's voice was a musical blend of the resonant emotions of a Richard Tucker and the more sonorous, earthy stability of a Jan Peerce. And in an uncanny coincidence of nature, he even resembled the two, in hybrid, combining Peerce's short, stocky, barrel-chested stature with Tucker's warm, inviting eyes, dark wavy hair and melting, mischievous smile.

As he fed the material under the driving needle of the spindle, the tailor sang to the heavens, transformed by the privacy of the moment into a starry-eyed Jewish Rudolpho, his passion suddenly awakened by the beautiful Mimi standing before him in the doorway of his cold, bohemian's attic studio. Che Gelida Manina, How Cold Your Hands Are, he sang to her with the passion and the purpose of a man deeply in love.

Or, as he pushed on the pedal of the motor, he imagined himself alone on the stage, a virtuoso soloist under the thin spotlight in the vast, darkened theatre. He sang Pagliacci's sobbing, sorrowful, heart-broken lament, his will to live ebbing, seeking the strength merely to don his costume, to smile, to walk off the stage in dignity.

The tailor's performances were always flawless. The audience, of course, was wildly, if respectfully appreciative, sustaining its applause much longer than it took him to sew pockets into a pair of trousers or alter a sleeve in a misshapen sports jacket.

It was hardly surprising that he sang arias in which he detected traces of chazzanut, arias that touched the inner core of his soul, the part shaped by the happiness of the family that had nurtured and sustained him so very long ago.

But now the tailor lay in a hospital bed. He could no longer sing; he could no longer even speak. His eyes were closed. Machinery, it seemed, as much as man was striving to save his life. Tubes and plastics helped him to breathe; filaments and wires helped his heart to beat.

It was the Sabbath, nine days before Pesach.

Three days earlier, in the hopeful beginnings of a new spring, he came to the hospital complaining of digestive discomfort. Yet, even in his initial distress, he still sang quietly to himself the familiar tunes of the approaching holiday. Before too many hours passed however, he was no longer able to bring forth any melodies.

Less than two miles away from the hospital, four of the tailor's grandchildren sat around the Sabbath table in their home, waiting for news but afraid to hear what they dreaded. Their hands were joined, completing a circle in whose intertwined connections, they found strength.

They were four curly-topped young girls, none of them out of their teens, one of them not yet into her teens.

They were home alone. Their parents were at the hospital, at the tailor's bedside, where they had been, without interruption, for four days.

When the sun began its final descent into the western sky, the young sisters lit the Sabbath candles. They could no longer wait for their parents, though they ached to have them home, the family whole again, all sadness averted.

But they knew their parents were not coming home soon.

Holding back tears even as they held onto each other, they blessed God with the multiple blessings for his instruction to bring light into the Sabbath home, for creating the fruits of the vine and for bringing forth bread from the land.

But they ate very little, nibbling at the food more out of respect for the Sabbath than out of appetite.

They knew their grandfather, the apprentice, soldier, survivor, shopkeeper, tailor, was now in the penumbra where this world and the next world meet. His life was slipping away.

Against their will, tears came anyway.

And they determined to sing. Yedid Nefesh, Companion of My Soul; Lecha Dodi, To You My Love; songs of the prayerbrook; songs of Jewish eastern Europe; any songs that he might have once sung too because they knew how much he had loved to sing and how he had loved to hear them sing. They sang loudly; they sang fiercely; they sang the choking songs of farewell.

To this very minute and always, when I reflect on the final instant on earth of the soul of the tailor from Bodzentin, I imagine it soaring upward and high into the deep invisible blue of the pathway to heaven through a corridor of his grandchildren's song.

And it was surely noticed among the angels that the harmony the young sisters created for their grandfather's ascending soul, like the love they felt for him, was pure and sweet, an eternal, lasting testament to the goodness of the man they would never see again.

March of the Living cancels Israel portion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Montreal is the only Canadian city, and one of a handful of contingents worldwide, that plans to proceed with a March of the Living trip to both Poland and Israel this year.

The Israel arm of this year's educational trip for 1,500 high school students was cancelled by the international March of the Living (MOL) organization following a March 13 conference call to representatives from participating countries, including Canada. The two-week trip has always culminated in Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in Israel after visits to concentration camp sites in Poland.

In a statement, the international MOL office said it "could not put these young people at risk under the current conditions. Since the teens have invested a lot of time and energy in preparation for this program it was decided that the Poland-only option be taken."

It was left up to each group to decide whether to participate in the changed program.

Following the controversial decision, which prompted Jerusalem Post columnist David J. Forman to dub the revised MOL the "March of the Dead," organizers in Toronto postponed their trip until next year. Organizers of the trip for students from other Canadian cities plan to participate in the Poland-only program, but with modifications to compensate for the cancellation.

"Obviously the Israel part is crucial. It has to do with continuity and the connection to Israel," said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive director of UIA Federations Canada, which funds the program nationally. "From a national perspective, we took the position that if a community would still like to go [to Israel], we'll work with them to help them organize, and give them financial support."

Finkelstein said she was saddened by the international organization's decision. "It's a heartbreaking thing. People spend the whole year preparing for it. It's a very significant experience. For many, it's their first opportunity to go to Israel and to see it in a very special way, coming from Poland."

Montreal would not have a Poland-only trip, said Ruth Najman, March of the Living co-ordinator at Montreal's Bronfman Jewish Education Centre (BJEC) and its Bronfman Israel Experience Centre (BIEC). "We believe that, from an educational standpoint, Israel is an integral part of March of the Living."

In light of the situation, the Israel itinerary has been modified and shortened, and will take place mostly in the desert. The changed focus will "take advantage of the rich thematic opportunities [the desert] offers, including Ben Gurion's dream of 'making the desert bloom' [and] the pioneering spirit," the BJEC/BIEC said in a statement.

The statement also said the BIEC "recognizes that the decision for a student to participate... rests solely with the parents, and as such, we will respect their decisions." Organizers would "reluctantly agree" to allow participants to return to Montreal directly from Poland.

The Montreal trip is contingent on security clearance from

Number of anti-Semitic incidents reported up in '01

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The number of anti-Semitic incidents reported in Canada last year increased slightly over the year before, continuing a long-term trend of steady growth, states a report prepared by B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

A total of 286 incidents were reported to the League in 2001, roughly the same as in 2000 but an increase of 35 per cent over the level reported only five years ago, according to the 2001 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents.

The audit, which was released last week, surveys harassment and vandalism occurrences, including synagogue and cemetery desecrations, bomb threats, physical threats, verbal and written abuse, graffiti and assaults. The League has released a report every year since 1982.

The 2001 report differs from its predecessors because it includes several new elements besides reports of anti-Semitic events:

- a survey of attitude changes among Canadians;
- a study of the use of the Internet to disseminate hate propaganda;
- an update on relevant legal decisions;
- a look at developments in other countries; and
- an analysis of anti-racism issues in the aftermath of the UN anti-racism conference this past fall in Durban, South Africa.

The report noted that the number of incidents in 2001 spiked in September and October, immediately after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Approximately 35 per cent of all occurrences last year can be linked to the fallout from the attacks, the League estimated.

The vast majority of reported incidents took place in Ontario (186 or 65.03 per cent), with Quebec reporting 83, or 29.02 per cent of the incidents. Manitoba, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Maritimes reported far fewer cases, ranging from 2.1 per cent in Manitoba to a scant .35 per cent in the Maritimes.

The audit found disturbing developments in Montreal – which accounted for 78 of the Quebec incidents.

In addition to a sharp increase in the number of occurrences in recent years – a 290 per cent rise since 1998 – public attitudes in Quebec revealed a "puzzling finding of concern."

The attitudinal survey, undertaken by COMPAS, a polling and research organization, found "the continued apparently greater antagonism of Quebecers than Canadians as a whole towards African-Canadians, Italians and especially Jews.

"A perplexing aspect of Quebecers' apparent antagonism towards Jews is evidence that such negative feelings do not abate, as they normally do in democratic societies, as education rises. The data suggest that education may even be reinforcing such sentiments," stated COMPAS president Conrad Winn.

When asked whether Jews as a group have too much power, 26 per cent of Quebecers agreed they had, compared to only 10 per cent for the rest of Canada. Sixteen per cent of Quebec respondents also believed that Italians held too much power, compared to six per cent for the rest of Canada.

Winn did report some cause for optimism. The survey found that attitudes towards Jews and minorities improved greatly among people under 30, while a less "democratic spirit" can be found among those older than 60.

In other parts of the report, lawyer and human rights advocate David Matas suggested that many in the Canadian anti-racist community, who participated in the Durban conference and endorsed its concluding documents, put their own narrow issues ahead of broader human rights issues. In doing so, they overlooked the meeting's anti-Semitic excesses and damaged the credibility of human rights organizations.

Looking ahead to Durban's follow-up conference in five years, Matas said, "Durban was an anti-Semitic jamboree. Is the anti-racist community going to sign up for yet another anti-Semitic jamboree five years hence? That is the equality issue the follow up to Durban poses."

Israel appeals to Canada to blunt UN measures

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel wants Canada to blunt the effects of several hostile resolutions awaiting the Jewish state before the annual meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR), but Liberal MP and human rights expert Irwin Cotler says Ottawa should really work to change the forum's "systemic bias" against Israel.

Last week, Israel's ambassador to the UN, Yehuda Lancry, asked Canada "to be our voice" at the meeting, which began last week in Geneva and is slated to end April 26. Israel has only observer status at the commission, and Canada is one of its few Western members that can demand a vote on resolutions, meaning Israel's supporters can at least be heard, even when harsh resolutions are passed.

Israel's entreaty to Canada appears to have been heard. Last Tuesday, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham conceded the UNCHR has been unfair and one-sided in its attacks on Israel, and pledged to work with Israel to bring about more balance.

Graham said Canada would plot its moves "in close consultation" with Israel.

That's commendable, Cotler told The CJN, but the "real issue here is the role that Canada can play is getting countries to address and redress the issue of systemic bias within the human rights commission, which in the end, is not only prejudicial to Israel, but is prejudicial to the whole cause of human rights."

Even before the commission's proceedings began, Arab states were updating at least five resolutions condemning Israel that the 53-member body passed last year.

To Cotler, who plans to visit the commission's meeting, that constitutes "an item-specific indictment of Israel even before [the meeting] begins. Thirty per cent of the commission's time is taken up with an obsessive preoccupation with Israel, while the real major human rights violators gain exculpatory immunity.

"In the end, one-third of the resolutions passed will be those indicting Israel, while the rest of the world shares 70 per cent. That systemic bias undermines the integrity of the UN."

Indeed, at last year's UNCHR meeting, only 11 other countries, including Iraq and Congo, faced one resolution each.

Canada, said Cotler, can try to mobilize support for changing that bias. "It isn't easy," he added. "Canada is only one of a number of countries on the commission, many of which are hardcore human rights violators, like Sudan."

Deep-seated anti-Israel bias at international forums is "part of a pattern and process," Cotler said, citing last summer's UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa and last November's meeting of the High Contracting Parties to the Geneva Conventions, which passed several measures condemning Israel's military actions against civilians.

But Cotler noted the significance of Canada being able to call for a vote at the UNCHR. Without a ballot, resolutions will appear to be unanimously endorsed.

"The importance of a vote lies in the fact that it holds people to account and allows countries like Canada, as it did last year, to vote against and possibly, to defeat [resolutions]. A consensus resolution has more prejudicial fallout than one that is voted on, and in which Canada can at least indicate clearly that it disassociates itself from it."

Last year, Canada voted against a resolution saying Israel was guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, Cotler noted.

Cotler has held talks about this year's session with Graham and with Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior. Graham has also met with Rabbi Melchior.

Cotler noted too that members of the House of Commons' subcommittee on human rights, chaired by Hamilton MP Beth Phinney, have been invited to attend the commission's meeting.

The United States, Israel's traditional ally at the UN, failed to win a seat for this year's meeting. Observers have said that opens the door for Canada to take a leadership role.

Indeed, it's a development Israel has seized on. "In the sphere of the United Nations, Canada is always immediately behind the United States in helping to support and defend Israel," Lancry was quoted as saying earlier this month. "We certainly expect that in Geneva they will perform likewise."

Lancry underlined that sentiment last week, saying Israel is "very grateful" to Canada for its support at the UN and its stated efforts to work with his country at the commission.

At a news conference in Geneva last week, Graham conceded the commission has singled out Israel at the height of Toronto students march in support of Israel

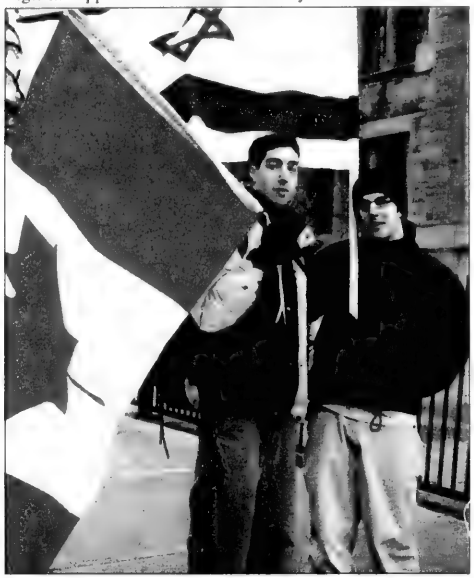
By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Students gathered for a vigil in support of Israel last Thursday, despite the icy March wind that blew across the University of Toronto campus.

More than 75 students met in front of the Sidney Smith Building to light candles, chant tehillim and recite the Prayer for the State of Israel, in an event sponsored by several organizations, including Jewish Campus Services (JCS).



A moment of silence was observed after the students read the 20 names of those killed in terrorist attacks in the last nine days, not including the four Israelis killed on March 21, the day of the vigil.

After the moment of silence, the group began a solidarity march to the Israeli Consulate, where they sang Hatikvah.

The vigil was important and necessary because this type of a gathering hasn't happened here in a long time, said JCS Israel Affairs co-ordinator Stuart Lapowich, 25, before the vigil.

Adam Cutler, 20, a University of Toronto student, encouraged the group to show their support for Israel in every way possible.

"If you can, go to Israel," he said. "If you can't go, give money or support the Israeli economy by buying Israeli products."

In addition, Cutler told the group to write the Canadian government to express concern over Canada's voting record at the United Nations.

This rally marks a turning point for students, Cutler noted.

"We can't let our sorrow overcome our need to speak out... Let's attend more rallies and go public with our support for Israel."

"It marks a need to come together as a group and walk in solidarity with our brothers and sisters in Israel in pursuit of peace," said U of T student Bram Bregman, 21.

"Today's vigil begins an end to our silence," he added.

Hatred doomed to fail

We retell the story of the delivery of our ancestors from their slavery in Egypt; in fact, we "relive" it, to impress into our children's souls the multi-layered lessons of the Exodus.

• The Exodus is one of the foundations of our faith.

• Our faith is an affirmation and a testament to the sovereignty of the one God of history.

• History has a purpose. In the words of scholar Nahum Sarna, "It is not a concatenation of haphazard incidents but rather an unfolding of God's grand design."

That design, of course, is for a world in which slavery, oppression, injustice, cruelty, inhumanity and the victimization of others do not exist. That design, of course, is for a world in which peace for all peoples prevails. That design of course, is for a world in which the Jewish people too are sovereign and secure within their own state: Israel.

Alas, there are some people on earth who bridle at the mere thought of a sovereign Jewish state. They recoil at the thought of a Jewish body politic in the Muslim Middle East. By their statements and by their actions, they tell us there is no place in this world for Israel.

And thus, they make war against Israel.

The grief-stricken mourners in the second photo, whose private sorrow we intrude upon, are among the war's victims.

But in truth, we know that the people who make war against Israel also intend to make war against Jews, the West and the values we, as a people, brought to the West and cherish.

Foremost among those values is freedom in all its manifestations and responsibilities. And what, if not freedom, is the pre-eminent theme, discussion and discourse at the seder table?

Israel's enemies are motivated by hate. They are not motivated by the desire to "build' as much as they are driven by the need to destroy. Moreover, and most important, they are utter strangers to the idea and the blessing of freedom. Were it otherwise, they would know how to build.

Because of their embrace of hatred and destruction, Israel's enemies are doomed to fail, much as Pharaoh ultimately failed.

Sarna explains why: "All the power of the mighty pharaoh, the outward magnificence of his realm, the dazzling splendour of his court, his colossal monuments – all are illusory, ephemeral, and in the ultimate reckoning, insignificant and they must crumble into dust because they rest on foundations empty of moral content."

As we gather with family and friends at the seder table, we must therefore bear in mind where we are in Jewish history and what we will contribute to the pages of that history. We must think about the connection between the war being waged against Israel even as we find joy and new memories in the celebration of our holiday.

Gil Troy suggests one way of making that connection. But of course, there are other ways too. The key is that, as we thank God for having brought us to the celebration of yet another Pesach, we all at least look for a way.

March of Living should proceed

The Toronto organization of the March of the Living has cancelled this year's March out of fear of taking the teenagers to Israel following the visit to Poland. Other communities, I have learned, will take their students to Poland but not to Israel. While I understand the concerns that have led to these decisions, and I am sure that they were taken after serious consideration, I believe, nonetheless, that they are wrong and convey a terribly disturbing message.

I understand parents' misgivings with regard to sending their children to visit Israel at this time, and I would not criticize those who would opt not to send them. However, the organized Jewish community should not capitulate to the Arab strategy of intimidation that is aimed at Israelis and Jews throughout the world. Missions to Israel must continue, though individuals may exercise their right to decide whether or not they will participate. The cancellation of such organized trips, including the March of the Living and even just the March's Israel segment, conveys the message that in difficult times, the Diaspora community does not really stand shoulder to shoulder with its Israeli sisters and brothers. That is the wrong message to transmit to our teenagers, and those responsible for it, to my mind, have forfeited their right to leadership positions in the community.

Perhaps even worse is the message being given to the Israelis – which is, in effect, "Have your war, and when it's over, we might stop by to visit." How demoralizing – for us and for them!

In an article in the March 20 issue of the Jerusalem Post, it was reported that the United Jewish Federation of Metro West, New Jersey, had issued a statement indicating that it would pick up where the March of the Living organization left off. This federation will provide the Israel component of the trip for those who wish to continue on after Poland because, as the article said, "for a March of the Living program to emphasize visitation of concentration camps and other devastation against the Jewish people in Europe, without participants witnessing the rebirth of the Jewish State, is not the message we want to impart."

Where is the Toronto Jewish federation in this?

No one "basks" in compliments

Isaac Alalouf's letter in your March 14 issue ("Reader objects to letters") is factually incorrect.

I do not recall either a letter or interview printed in The CJN at any time that could remotely be construed as someone "basking in the compliments" of Israelis who show their appreciation towards tourists visiting the suffering country standing alone in the world.

Having visited Israel many times since the intifadah started, and having had several letters printed in The CJN encouraging others to also visit Israel, let me assure Alalouf that, neither in print nor when talking to people, do I "bask" in compliments. I know many others who have visited Israel in the last 18 months and have not come across one person "basking" in compliments either. Nevertheless, without exception, Israelis are very appreciative when they meet tourists.

It would be interesting to hear about Alalouf's experiences in Israel since the intifadah started – that is, of course, if he has even been there during the past 1½ years. I wonder.

CJC tries to teach Tories

In his column in the CJN's March 7 issue, Ron Csillag asks a rhetorical question in relation to the Sabbath voting procedure for the upcoming Tory leadership convention: "Where were Canadian Jewish Congress and Ontario's various rabbinic groups to tell the Tories months ago that a proxy vote was a non-starter for Jews?"

When issues such as the Sabbath voting procedure are brought to our attention, we respond accordingly. As such, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, has publicly responded to the Ontario Progressive Conservative party's voting policy that would clearly exclude Sabbath observers from casting a vote during the leadership convention. This was followed up by a letter of serious concern from me to the executive director of the Ontario Conservative party, Jeff Bangs.

CJCONT continues to work with the Progressive Conservative Party in order to resolve this situation so that in future leadership campaigns, there are policies and procedures in place that include all Ontarians.

Making Jews acceptable

Back in the days of rampant Canadian anti-Semitism, it was a widely spread custom for Jews to change their names so that they could find employment and at least some social and political acceptance. It was understandable to shed a family name, as long as it did not involve shedding one's Jewishness along with it.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Perhaps it comes as a surprise to some of my readers that the habit of changing a Jewish name to a gentile-sounding one was customary in certain parts of American culture as well. This was especially true in the film industry, where many of the top brass adopted non-Jewish names, and where some of the best known stars followed the same policy, so that the great majority of Hollywood actors were, at one time, Jews in gentile disguise. At the end of this article I will mention only a few of the names, but meanwhile, I will point out that the temptation to change one's name is an old one.

The fascinating thing is that the Midrash, thousands of years ago, recalled the reasons why the Jews in Egypt were rescued by God. What was it, the Midrash asks, that caused God to reward them? One of the answers is that, despite all the persecution that they had to endure in the land, they kept their Jewish names and, of course, were faithful to their tradition as well.

Apply this old lesson to modern name-changing. It is, in most cases, unobjectionable, as long as the bearer does not abandon his or her Jewish identity in private life and personal conviction. That is one of the lessons that Pesach brings with it, along with its many other cultural and religious stimuli, and when you celebrate it, be aware of the great inheritance that has been yours. Your name may publicly attest to this tradition, but more important, let it be the guideline of your own life.

Here is a brief list of Hollywood names that can be expanded significantly if you are interested:

- Samuel Goldwyn was Samuel Goldfish;
- Lauren Bacall was Betty Joan Perske;
- Jack Benny was Benjamin Kubelsky;
- George Burns was Nathan Birnbaum;
- Kirk Douglas was Issur Demsky;
- Bob Dylan was Robert Zimmerman;
- Rodney Dangerfield was Jacob Cohen;
- Douglas Fairbanks Sr. was Douglas Ullman;
- Jason Alexander was Jason Greenspan;
- Woody Allen was Allen Stewart Konigsberg;
- Hal Linden was Harold Lipschitz;
- Mel Brooks was Melvin Kaminsky;
- Danny Kaye was David Kominsky;
- Dorothy Lamour was Dorothy Kaumeyer; and
- Tony Curtis was Bernie Schwartz.

Chag Sameach, everybody.

Breaking news

The first indication of trouble usually consists of just a sentence or two. Despite the lack of details, there's no mistaking what's to follow soon.

The initial report that something substantial has happened comes in from any one of several sources: a police announcement to journalists' beepers; a phone call from an eyewitness; a brief bulletin from a news agency; or a sketchy report on the radio. Few words are wasted as it is announced that a terrorist attack took place a few minutes ago in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv or Haifa or Hadera, or Beersheva or wherever. People are injured. How many? Is anyone killed? We don't know yet.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

At the headquarters of Israel Television in Jerusalem where I work as a journalist, new bad news travels fast. "Did you hear?" asks one colleague to another. "There's been a pigua [terrorist attack] in downtown Jerusalem." Pigua, pigua, pigua... oh how I've come to despise this Hebrew word and everything it evokes. Pigua... how I resent that this word has become so prominent in our daily life over the past 18 months.

With the first sign of a major terrorist assault, the news staff and support team at the TV station quickly kick into high gear. Ironically, it is when dealing with such harrowing events that the building really comes alive, operating at its best. By now it is a finely honed scenario. Unfortunately, after having covered so many previous attacks, it's become an all-too-familiar, almost ritualistic routine for my colleagues and me.

News producers dispatch reporters, camera crews and broadcast trucks to the scene of the attack and to hospitals treating the wounded. In the newsroom and studio, editors, reporters and production assistants scramble to prepare a special news bulletin that breaks into regular programming even before there is any video footage from the site of the latest pigua.

All the while, fresh facts flow in constantly from different sources. Invariably, the story becomes more gruesome with every update as the number of those killed and wounded climbs. The full scale of death and destruction hits home hard. Images of the premeditated slaughter of men, women and children start to appear on the screen.

Everyone in the newsroom is horrified, even if we've come to know such pictures only too well in our jobs. We digest the material as journalists, human beings and Israelis and not necessarily in that order. All of us share the same unspoken fear: That someone dear to us may be among the victims. In stolen moments amid all the craziness and deadline pressures, we make urgent calls home and to other relatives and close friends silently praying that no one is missing.

If everyone in Israel must contend with difficult situations, working in the news media only magnifies the harsh reality. It's in your face – literally – every day. For the past 10 years that I've been an editor/reporter and anchor at IBA News, Israel's only daily English-language TV newscast, there has been no escaping it. Sometimes I ask myself what it does to me.

There are days when our entire broadcast consists of pure, unadulterated bad news, except perhaps for the weather forecast. And that does not include what we leave on the cutting floor. Some of the "raw" footage of attacks that we receive is too raw for viewers. These horrific images should never be seen by anyone. We see them, but wish we hadn't.

The day after an attack, there is no letup in the sadness. By then, with the victims identified and their families notified, we release the names of the dead, announce their funerals, report from the hospitals on the wounded, (many of whom are fighting for their lives), and cover the political fallout from the latest terrorist outrage.

At times, it seems as if we're covering one blood-drenched breaking story after another. Breaking indeed. Breaking the hearts, even if not the will, of our country. Stay tuned...

Ariel Sharon's dilemma

Facing a second Passover – the celebration of freedom – under the continued threat of terrorism and murder, Israelis are shell-shocked. Suicide bombings and other killings have taken almost 400 lives and many more people have been injured. In the past few weeks, the rate of terror has escalated, and dozens of people have been killed, leading to the decision to send the IDF into Palestinian cities and camps.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For older Israelis who have lived through the wars of the past decades, the current wave of violence is not quite as traumatic as it is for younger Israelis. In the War of Independence, 6,000 people, or one per cent of the population, were killed.

Israel is now much larger and stronger, and more resilient. But this is no comfort to a generation raised in an environment of optimism and the promise of peace. They have been dragged into the reality of suicide bombers motivated by a deep hatred for Israel, Jews and the West. After many years spent in support of negotiations to reach a "just peace" based on two states, Jewish and Palestinian, they feel cheated. Their Palestinian partners, it turns out, were only using the slogans of peace to reach the real goal: the destruction of Israel.

As a result, younger Israelis are rediscovering the core values of Zionism that brought many of their parents and grandparents to Israel. The talk shows on radio and television and newspaper editorial columns are filled with reminders that the Jewish people fought to build the State of Israel after the Holocaust in order to defend themselves. With this background, no one talks about leaving and abandoning this historic mission.

While a wide consensus exists on the overall objective, the debates on the strategy and tactics necessary to ensure national survival are intense. One year ago, Ariel Sharon was elected prime minister by an overwhelming majority, on a platform of using more force to restore security while also pursuing a viable peace with the Palestinians. Sharon surprised many observers by putting together a "national unity government" that included longtime opponent Shimon Peres, the architect of the failed Oslo peace process. Polls showed that many Israelis supported this combination.

As the terror attacks escalated, Sharon's decision to clip Yasser Arafat's wings by destroying his helicopters and confining the chairman of the Palestinian Authority to Ramallah was seen as a turning point that would bring this confrontation to an end. However, Arafat again turned the tables on Sharon, becoming a victim and object of sympathy in the outside world, while also encouraging his followers to send "one million suicide bombers to Jerusalem."

As the horrors of these terror attacks grew, Sharon has tried to rally the population. But his actions were timid, and his speeches are a far cry from the promised Churchillian oratory of fierce determination. Last month's promise to create a buffer zone to keep terrorists out did not lead to visible action. As his poll ratings dropped precipitously, the volume of criticism, on both the left and the right, increased.

The former Israeli "peace camp" demanded greater flexibility in the hope that willingness to talk about ceasefire terms might bring a Palestinian response in kind. In contrast, Sharon's core constituency demanded intensified military action to defeat Arafat and "send him and his terrorists back to Tunis."

Once again, Sharon is taking both paths. Dispatching the IDF to Palestinian strongholds to conduct house-to-house searches for explosives, missiles, and other weapons banned under the Oslo agreements scored some impressive achievements. The surrender of hundreds of armed Palestinians boosted Israeli morale. At the same time, Sharon is allowing Arafat to resume travel outside Ramallah, and Sharon is talking to the Americans about implementing a ceasefire.

Despite the contradictions, if this combination of military pressure and political flexibility provides hope for an end to terror, Sharon's ratings will bounce back. But if this approach fails, Israelis will start in earnest to look for a new leader (perhaps another round for former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu) with a much tougher approach. Another year of terrorism, funerals and hopelessness is intolerable.

The Kirshner File

Banker Louis Rasminsky broke barriers

Louis Rasminsky fought and won. At a time when anti-Semitism was rampant in Canada, he overcame the deep-seated prejudices of the day and went on to become one of Canada's most distinguished civil servants, first as deputy governor and then as governor of the Bank of Canada.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A man of consummate intelligence, energy and honesty, Rasminsky had the misfortune of coming of age in an era when a person was invariably judged on the basis of ethnicity and religion rather than on merit and competence.

In 1937, when he was an economist at the League of Nations in Geneva, the Canadian civil service scarcely had any place for Jews, no matter how smart and talented they happened to be. Rasminsky, who had joined the League of Nations in 1930, had his heart set on returning to Canada and landing a job with the newly-formed Royal Commission on Banking. He ran into a brick wall of ingrained hostility.

O.D. Skelton, the undersecretary of state for external affairs, had met Rasminsky and was impressed by his demeanour and abilities. "It struck me that he had the most vigorous and clear-cut intellectual equipment I had met in a young man for years," he observed. Nevertheless, there was nothing Skelton could do for Rasminsky, and he was left out in the cold "because of the prejudice in question." He would have to wait until 1940 before being summoned to Ottawa.

After his appointment to Canada's Foreign Exchange Control Board, Rasminsky rose in the ranks, writes Bruce Muirhead in Against the Odds: The Public Life and Times of Louis Rasminsky (University of Toronto Press), the first biography I've read about him. Yet he was twice passed over for promotion before being named the Bank of Canada's governor in 1961.

Rasminsky, whose father David hailed from Poland and whose mother Etta camefrom an Ontario Jewish family, was born in Montreal in 1908. The family moved to Toronto in 1913, and Rasminsky attended Harbord Collegiate in the city's Jewish district. He was an outstanding student and an accomplished debater, and his parents encouraged his academic achievements. He was the school's valedictorian in 1925, and he won a number of scholarships to study at the University of Toronto.

Tied with another student, an Anglican, for top spot in his graduating class, Rasminsky failed to win a special scholarship for advanced studies in economics at Cambridge University in England, one of the preferred routes for academically gifted and upwardly mobile students. And since his parents lacked the means to finance his studies abroad, he seemed stuck.

Fortunately for Rasminsky, one of his teachers intervened, persuading the Jewish community to establish a scholarship fund for him. And so, in 1928, he set off to the equally famous London School of Economics, there to be befriended by the renowned lecturer, Harold Laski.

With Laski as his supervisor, Rasminsky embarked on writing a thesis on the topic of The Quest for Discrimination and Non-Discrimination in Trade Relations. He never finished it, having been lured to the League of Nations' International Labour Organization. In Geneva, his home for a decade, Rasminsky performed a variety of tasks, editing the publication Money and Banking, drafting the first volume of a series titled Monetary Review, and heading up a commission of inquiry on nutrition in Europe.

During this period, Canadian diplomats visited Geneva quite regularly, and through these visits Rasminsky met Hume Wron – the future undersecretary of state in the Department of External Affairs – and Lester Pearson, the future prime minister.

Although his duties kept him busy, Rasminsky was active in helping Jewish refugees escape continental Europe for safer shores in England. Muirhead, a professor of history at Lakehead University, claims that he purchased rail and boat tickets with his own funds for the refugees.

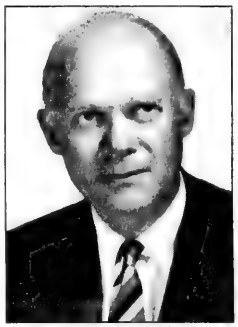
Convinced that a European war loomed, Rasminsky sent his wife Lyla and infant son Michael back to Canada in 1938. He himself left Geneva on business two weeks before the outbreak of World War II in September 1939. He cabled the League of Nations offering to return, but was told to remain in Canada.

Subsequently, Rasminsky was dispatched to Bolivia to assess its financial situation. His mission to La Paz was part of a League policy to build a higher profile in Latin America.

Joining the Foreign Exchange Control Board, which had been created in 1939 to finance the war effort, Rasminsky presided over its economic and research division. By 1943, he was in charge of the board's day-to- day operations and was involved in the establishment of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board. More importantly, as far as his career was concerned, he was now on the staff of the Bank of Canada.

As one of the very few Jews in the civil service, he attracted the attention of Jew baiters. In 1944, citing Rasminsky by name, a French Canadian Independent Conservative parliamentarian, Frederic Dorion (Charlevoix-Saguenay), lashed out against "Russian Jews" at the Bank of Canada. Brooke Claxton, a Liberal MP (St. Laurent-St. George), denounced Dorion. Phillippe Picard (Bellechasse) seconded Claxton's remarks. In 1945, Rasminsky was targeted yet again by Social Credit MP Norman Jacques (Westaskiwin), who insinuated that the pivotal Bretton Woods agreement was effectively a Jewish plot.

Jacques was referring to Rasminsky's contributions to the formation of the International Monetary Fund and its twin organization, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, both of which played an integral role in global exchange stability in the wake of World War II. Muirhead elaborates on this aspect of his career at length, but it is awfully dry stuff and not for a general reader.



Louis Rasminsky

Although Rasminsky was a prized Bank of Canada functionary, his path to the governorship was blocked by anti-Semitism. When Donald Gordon left the bank in 1949 to become chairman of Canadian National Railways, Rasminsky believed he stood a good chance to replace him as deputy governor, a cabinet appointment. The officers of the Department of Finance thought so too, but James Coyne got the nod instead. Speculating that anti-Semitism was "a possible explanation" for his setback, Muirhead provides no firm evidence to support the accusation.

Muirhead, however, quotes a Bank of England official as saying that "Rasminsky's failure to reach the very top is widely attributed to anti-Semitism." Furthermore, Muirhead relates an exchange between Rasminsky and the son of the former prime minister, Louis St. Laurent, in which the latter supposedly said that anti-Semitism accounted for Rasminsky's rejection.

In any event, Rasminsky was finally promoted to deputy governor in 1955, sharing the title with a colleague. In 1961, when John Diefenbaker was prime minister, he succeeded Coyne as governor.

Muirhead suggests that Rasminsky's 1955 promotion came through because the bank was afraid of losing him. In 1953, when he was serving as an adviser to the Bank of Israel, the University of Toronto, his alma mater, asked him to become chair of the department of political economy following the death of Harold Innis.

Rasminsky retired in 1973, and in Muirhead's judgment, he filled the position with distinction. Indeed, after his resignation was announced, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the prime minister, sent a letter of appreciation to Rasminsky.

He wrote: "The last two or three years have been one of extraordinary difficulty for those who were responsible for financial or economic advice and policy... It was a great advantage to the government to know that decisions in the extremely important financial matters with which you were charged were being taken by a person of such capacity, integrity and dedication to the public good."

After leaving the bank, he was as busy as ever. He sat on company boards, among them Bell Canada and American Express. He became the head of the International Development Research Centre in Ottawa. He worked closely with Jewish organizations, from the United Jewish Appeal to the United Israel Appeal. He also identified himself with the Hebrew University, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Weizmann Institute and, at Mayor Teddy Kollek's urging, the Jerusalem Foundation.

Against the Odds, the product of meticulous research and thorough interviews, stands as a comprehensive account of Rasminsky's life. But for all its thoroughness, this biography is arid, falling short of drawing a fully rounded human portrait of a great Canadian.

Professor seeks affordable housing for all

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Avi Friedman, a professor at the McGill University School of Architecture, is one of Canada's leading advocates of affordable housing.

In an era when the cost of residential homes in many communities is shooting through the roof, he offers millions of Canadians a ray of hope.

Through the Affordable Homes Program, which he co-founded with Witold Rybczynski in 1988, Friedman is literally changing the way people live.

Born and raised in Israel and now a dual Canadian-Israeli citizen, Friedman has had the good fortune of being able to put his ideas into practice.

Since joining McGill 14 years ago, he has designed three housing prototypes: Grow Home, Next Home and La Casa a la Carta.

Built as full-scale demonstration projects, they were subsequently used by home builders in the private sector.

Grow Home, which he first presented in 1990, is a narrow-front rowhouse that allows both the perimeter and the interior to be expanded and changed to fit an owner's tastes and budget.

Much to his satisfaction, thousands of units of the Grow Home have been built in Canada, Europe and the United States.

Friedman, whose work has been honoured by the United Nations and cited extensively in the media, has written a book about this prototype.

The Grow Home, his second book after Planning a New Suburbia (University of British Columbia Press) was published by McGill-Queen's University Press.

The Next Home, which he unveiled in 1996, is also adaptable.

"Buyers can select one, two or three stories based on their requirements," he explained.

"The interior is also flexible and lets people choose components, from kitchens to bathrooms, that best suit their needs."

He designed La Casa a la Carta and introduced it in Mexico five years ago. "It's a prototype for the developing world."

Friedman, who teaches mostly graduate students, says he and Rybczynski, who has since gone to the United States, devised the Affordable Homes Program.

They had two primary objectives in mind: to lower housing costs and to provide leadership and public outreach on an issue that is far from resolved, and has become what Friedman calls "one of Canada's social ills."

The program, which he directs, addresses the housing needs of first-time buyers and of non-traditional households whose annual income is below $30,000 – single parents, singles and the elderly.

In recognition of his contributions to low-cost housing solutions, the United Nations gave him its World Habitat Award in 1998. China's minister of construction personally presented it to him.

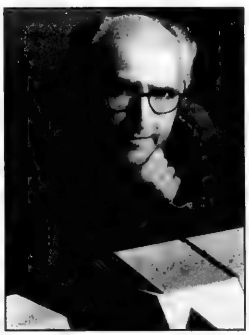
Friedman, whose consulting work has taken him across the length and breadth of North America, was born in Petach Tikvah – one of Israel's earliest settlements – in 1952.

When he was 10, he and his parents, both of whom are Holocaust survivors and settled in Israel in 1949, moved to Tel Aviv.

His parents and his sister still live there.

Architecture came naturally to Friedman. As he put it: "I loved to build stuff, and enjoyed drawing and inventing things when I was younger."

He began his studies at the Politecnico di Milano in Italy and finished his first degree at the Technion in Haifa, graduating first in his class.



Avi Friedman

Next, Friedman studied at McGill. He received an MA in 1982. "McGill offered me a generous scholarship. Besides, I wanted to study in a nice city and McGill happened to be in Montreal."

After McGill, he was employed as a designer by a Montreal developer, La Tulipe.

He completed his formal education in 1987, obtaining a PhD at the Universite de Montreal.

Friedman is in his element at McGill. "I like academia, and at times, I can't get over the fact that I'm paid to do what I truly enjoy."

Looking back, Friedman says he was influenced by Moshe Safdie, the Israeli architect who shot to fame during Expo 67.

"Israeli architecture, like the country itself, is new," he said. "It is quite an eclectic architecture."

Friedman, who still considers himself an Israeli, served in the Israel Defence Force from 1971 to 1974.

"I was on active duty during the (1973) Yom Kippur War. I was a medic and fought in the Sinai."

Indeed, his unit was one of the first to cross the Suez Canal into Africa.

An exceedingly busy man, Friedman writes for professional journals and popular periodicals on subjects ranging from prefabrication and construction technology to suburban planning and space management.

His academic articles have appeared in Housing and Society, Plan Canada, Building Research and Information and Journal of Architectural and Planning Research.

He has also written for the magazines Harrowsmith and Home Builder.

In addition, Friedman writes a column for The National Post that also appears in Southam newspapers.

"I generally write on issues related to housing and urban development."

Canadian and American television programs, from Dream Builders to Good Morning America, have picked up Friedman's innovative ideas.

Friedman, who celebrates his 50th birthday later this year, is married and has two children.

His wife, Sorel, originally from Winnipeg, teaches English at the Universite de Montreal. They have two teenage children, Paloma and Ben.

Passover Greetings

Our thoughts are with Israel

As Jews throughout the world gather around the seder table, we celebrate freedom and redemption, but we are also commanded to remember the hardship of our captivity. Contrasting the bitterness of slavery with the sweetness of freedom adds joy and meaning to the miracle of the Exodus story.

Escaping Egypt was only a step to our freedom. Liberation was complete when we came together as a nation, sovereign in our land and with the Torah eternally pointing our way.

As Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior put it, "The call 'Let my people go' heralded the first national liberation movement in history, and the model for every liberation which was to follow." Throughout history, it has been a source of inspiration for those living under oppression. As U.S. Senator Russ Feingold noted, "It is a story of human rights abuses, of revolution, of liberation from subjugation, of a captive people's escape from repressive rule, and of the founding of a new nation."

We are told to love the stranger because we were once strangers in Egypt. The obligation to remember slavery is not meant to instil victimhood in us. Rather, it spurs us on to be at the forefront in the struggle for human rights, equality and social justice.

Keith Landy, national president, Canadian Jewish Congress

Ironically, it is during this holiday celebrating freedom and human rights that the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the body that sponsored the infamous UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, holds its annual meeting. Repressive regimes such as those in Sudan, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Syria, led by despots reminiscent of Pharaoh, will denounce, slander and condemn Israel, the homeland of the descendants of the freed slaves.

This year, as we celebrate Passover, more than ever our thoughts are with our brothers and sisters in Israel. We take inspiration from their tenacity and courage. Let us use this holiday to reaffirm our commitment to, and solidarity with, Israel, secure in the knowledge that its foundation and principles are just, that its place as a member of the world community is guaranteed and that it will forever be a light unto the nations and at the centre of our hearts.

I wish you all a happy and kosher Pesach.

Thank you for helping out your fellow Jews

"In every generation a person is obligated to regard himself as if he had come out of Egypt."

Passover Greetings

It is amazing how one deeply moving passage from the Passover Haggadah can encapsulate the way in which the uniquely Jewish philosophy of collective responsibility ensures our strength and survival.

Ralph Shedletsky, chair, UJA Federation board of directors

When we consider assistance for fellow Jews, there is no "then" and "now." There is no "them" and "us." We were all slaves in Egypt. We were all oppressed and we were all freed. But our freedom depends on our responsibility for each other.

Similarly, in our time, the people of Israel are being victimized by terror. Therefore, we are, as well. The people of Israel are suffering physically, financially and psychology. Therefore, we have no choice but to help.

The Haggadah teaches us to regard ourselves as if we are there – in Israel – facing the same serious crisis and struggling together against the same violent enemies – to achieve normalcy and peace.

Our remarkable community has listened well to the Haggadah's timeless lessons.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto thanks you for joining us to help fund essential programs in Israel during this time of turmoil, for demonstrating solidarity during our many missions to Israel and for reaching out to Jews in need everywhere.

May you, your families, the people of Israel and Jews everywhere be blessed this Passover with health and peace from generation to generation.

Desperately seeking Jewish foster homes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One Shul, Two Homes is the name of a new campaign that evokes the image of a synagogue as a second, or spiritual, home, but it actually refers to homes being sought for Jewish foster children.

Although Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF &CS), is reluctant to use the word "crisis," he said the agency is having difficulty finding Jewish foster homes. The new campaign aims to recruit two new foster homes from the membership of every synagogue in the greater Toronto area.

One Shul, Two Homes new campaign of JF & CS

Toward the end of the 2000-2001 school year, JF&CS – a registered children's aid society – sent 8,000 brochures to Jewish day schools for children to take home that highlighted the the need for Jewish foster homes. Although it's hard to know if the brochures were the catalyst, JF&CS is currently working with seven potential new foster parents, Wolfe said recently. "That's the good news."

The bad news, he said, is that there's still a need for more homes, particularly for young children. "For young kids we need stay-at-home caregivers," he said.

"There's a desperate shortage of Jewish foster homes, and more kids coming into care who need foster care," said Howard Hurwitz, JF&CS' director of children's services, and originator of the One Shul, Two Homes campaign.

"Kids who come into care come from the full spectrum of religious observance," said Hurwitz. "We wanted to reach out to each of the shuls to see if they would partner with us and reach out to members of their community."

Although JF&CS has tried to increase awareness of the need for foster homes, Hurwitz said he guesses that, "for a lot of people, unless they hear about it in a direct way, the message doesn't sink in.

"This is an issue for us, the community, and for kids," he said. "We want to keep kids in Jewish homes and in the community."

There are currently 34 Jewish foster homes on JF&CS' roster, and 80 children in care, of whom 35 are in foster homes, said Wolfe. Some of the other children are in group homes.

At one point last year, Wolfe recalled, there was no Jewish foster home available for a child who needed one. "Eventually we found something on a temporary basis... That one was a crisis."

Foster parents can be married or single, and can have children at home or not. If potential foster parents are interested in fostering a certain age group or on a short-term basis or at a certain time of year – for example, during the summer – JF&CS is willing to work within those parameters.

The approval process takes about two months, and includes a home study. Parental training and child-related expenses are provided by the agency.

At an initial meeting last month, representatives from 15 local congregations discussed the ways that chesed committees, social action committees and rabbis could inform congregants about the need for foster homes. A few congregations have already included information in their synagogue bulletins, Hurwitz said.

A second meeting is planned for April 10. Anyone interested in attending should contact Selma Elzas, JF&CS' foster care co-ordinator, at 416-638-7800, extension 298.

Purim, Passover and community

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

Can different types of Jews be part of the same community? Sometimes it seems the leaders of different Jewish denominations spend a good deal of their time attacking each other. These attacks make you wonder whether Jews with different views can really get along.

I'd like to approach this issue by examining some similarities shared by Purim and Passover. Both celebrate the redemption of the Jewish people, and both teach lessons about the relationship between survival and tolerance.

One similarity is the emphasis on charity. For both holidays, there are specific charities to ensure the poor can celebrate properly. On Purim, the Book of Esther directs people to give matanot l'evyonim, "gifts to the poor," which the poor should use to celebrate Purim. On Passover, the Mishnah tells us even the poorest person was provided with four cups of wine for the seder. Even though wine is a luxury we wouldn't normally distribute to the poor, we provide it on Passover so they can celebrate properly. There is also a custom to collect maot chittim, money for wheat, to distribute to the poor to supply them with wheat for matzah and money for the seder.

Both holidays also emphasize the involvement of children. On Purim, we bring young children to hear the Megillah. Children dress in costumes and shake graggers when Haman's name is mentioned. On Passover, the Seder is structured to get children to ask questions. The Four Questions that start the seder are recited by the youngest child present. The afikoman game, in which a piece of matzah is held "ransom" by the children, is meant to keep them involved and excited throughout the seder.

What is the meaning of these similarities? Since both Purim and Passover celebrate survival and redemption, we have large, festive meals. Great care is taken to include all members of the community. On both holidays, hospitality is featured. Even though children are not expected to participate in these holidays until they are older, an exciting, child-friendly atmosphere is created to involve them. The needy, who normally can't afford lavish holiday meals, are provided for. This is because survival includes the entire community, no matter what age or tax bracket. And when celebrating survival, we make sure we celebrate as a community.

However, a final similarity is quite puzzling. These are the only holidays celebrated on different days by different groups. Purim is celebrated by most communities on the 14th of Adar, but on the 15th of Adar by people in walled cities. The seder is held on the 15th of Nissan. But in ancient times, if one could not bring a Passover sacrifice in time for the seder, it could be brought on the "Second Passover," observed a month later on the 15th of Iyar. If these holidays are meant to create a sense of community and include everyone, why allow different groups to observe them on different days?

I think the answer is that in order to have community, we must have tolerance. Unity is possible if we don't demand unanimity. Passover and Purim are community holidays, but we have to realize not everyone in the community is alike. And so the two holidays that emphasize community are the ones that also emphasize diversity. Unity and tolerance go hand in hand.

This lesson is profoundly important today. As an Orthodox rabbi, I have enormous disagreements with the Reform and Conservative movements. I do not accept the arguments of those who relativize the differences and see us as two sides of the same coin. Realistically, the differences between Orthodoxy and the liberal movements are far too profound to be considered a minor dispute. But despite these large differences, we can still unite as one people, if we treat each other with love and tolerance. Unanimity is impossible; people will always have different opinions. However, we can disagree without being disagreeable. This is the message of Purim and Passover: A real community must have the flexibility to encompass many different types of people.

Learning from the wicked child

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

What to do with the problem child – the one who is defiant and rebellious, ill-mannered and seemingly unredeemable – is one of the most agonizing dilemmas that parents and educators face.

As solutions running the gamut from understanding to suppression all vie with one another, a look at the Haggadah offers an unequivocal if disturbing prescription. One is commanded, with reference to the wicked child, to literally blunt his teeth ("set them on edge"). What kind of educational philosophy is at work here? What happened to always trying to bring out the best in the child, to faith in the pure soul beneath the dark layers of experience?

Part of the issue comes down to the ancient "nature versus nurture" debates, to the question of whether the child is simply "born under a bad sign" and will always be temperamentally out of step, or can be changed through a loving and supportive environment.

For Rabbi Eliyahu Dessler, the well-known author and rosh yeshiva, modern educational theories which counsel the creation of autonomous children are clearly misinformed when it comes to human nature, for in his words "even the embryo has instincts leading to evil... It is not independence that must be developed but submission." A staunch advocate of corporal punishment, Rabbi Dessler would no doubt see the Haggadah's formula for the wicked child as an obvious necessity when confronted with the child's evil inclination.

Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, on the other hand, predictably urges the reverse course, as he indicates in his Haggadah commentary: "Sometimes you see young people that are a little 'off.' You know why they're off? Because there wasn't anybody to believe in them. It's so easy to get off the highway when nobody believes in you... The clever person isn't far away from the wicked person. Who do you think the wicked child is? Someone who was never told how holy he is."

For Rebbe Nahman of Bratslav, the "rasha" is "the wayward self," a part of every human being that should not be stereotypically assigned to any one child: "Perhaps the Wayward Self is angry with God. Perhaps he is rationalizing, seeking to explain away his lack of devotion. As long as we hide from and keep hidden how we really feel about God, we remain with inner peace unattainable and world peace beyond us... when we hear the Wayward Self raising these questions within us, it does not mean that we are evil. Rather, let us hear in them a message, a call to strengthen our faith."

These words are inspirational in the way they link growth to honesty. Before condemning the wayward child/self, it is imperative to discern what this kind of anger represents. This is something that is often hard to hang onto, especially when confronted with a barrage of bad behaviour. I have often found myself struggling to maintain patience with such waywardness, looking to blunt its edge rather than uncover its source. Whatever tendencies a child has, what is education if not the attempt to face the challenge of diversity?

As it is, the wicked child has seen fit to show up at the table, and perhaps for tonight only, dayeinu, that is enough.

Serious divide between West and Islam

What Went Wrong?* by Bernard Lewis Oxford University Press, 2001

Books
Bernard Baskin

Bernard Lewis is one of the West's foremost authorities on Islamic history and culture. In What Went Wrong?, he discusses the surprising eclipse of the Middle East in the last five centuries, and how this decline has left a serious and dangerous divide between the West and the societies of Islam.

Half a millennium ago, Islam represented the greatest military power on earth. Its armies, at the very same time, were invading Europe and Africa, India and China. It was also the foremost economic power in the world, trading in a wide range of commodities through a far-flung network of commerce and communications in Asia, Europe, and Africa.

"It had achieved the highest level so far in human history in the arts and sciences of civilization. Islam introduced the use and manufacture of paper from China and decimal positional numbering from India. It is difficult to imagine modern literature or science without the one or the other."

But then, asserts the author, there was a dramatic change. In Europe many forms of science advanced enormously in the era of the Renaissance. A technological revolution, and other vast changes, both intellectual and material, followed. But in the Muslim world independent inquiry virtually came to an end. Science was for the most part reduced to the veneration of old and approved knowledge.

Moreover, there has been little disposition in the Middle East for the separation of church and state and the creation of a civil society governed by secular law. In addition, the relegation of women to an inferior position in society deprived the Islamic world of the talents and energies of half its people.

Lewis sums up the Islamic decline by suggesting that by all the standards that matter in the modern world – economic development and job creation, literacy and educational and scientific achievement, political freedom and respect for human rights – what was once a mighty civilization has indeed fallen low.

Generally speaking, Jews were better off under Muslim than under Christian rule until the rise and spread of Western tolerance in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Nazi propaganda, however, promoted and spread European style anti-Semitism in the Arab world. Many blamed all evil in the Middle East and indeed in the world on secret Jewish plots. This interpretation has pervaded much of the public discourse in the region, including education, the media and even entertainment.

The failure in 1948 of five Arab armies to prevent half a million Jews from establishing their own state was, for the Arabs, a devastating blow. "It was bad enough to be defeated by the great imperial powers of the West; to suffer the same fate at the hands of a contemptible gang of Jews was an intolerable humiliation. Anti-Semitism and its demonized picture of the Jew as a scheming, evil monster provided a soothing answer."

The author's final words in this brief but compelling analysis are blunt and challenging. "If the peoples of the Middle East continue on their present path, the suicide bomber may become a metaphor for the whole region, and there will be no escape from a downward spiral of hate and spite, rage and self-pity, poverty and oppression... if they can abandon grievance and victimhood, settle their differences, and join their talents, energies, and resources in a common creative endeavour, then they can once again make the Middle East, in modern times as it was in antiquity and in the Middle Ages, a major centre of civilization. For the time being, the choice is their own."

Passover humour on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Passover humour?

No, this isn't some kind of joke. Well, actually it is. Although Passover is more associated with maror than with mirth, today we are going to look at the lighter side of the holiday of liberation on the World Wide Web.

Harry Leichter's Jewish Humor site is massive with over 50 pages of jokes [http://www.haruth.com/jhumorlink.htm]. His Pesach page has a healthy selection of groaners including this one:

A Jewish man took his Pesach lunch to eat outside in the park. He sat down on a bench and began eating. A little while later, a blind man came by and sat down next to him. Feeling neighbourly, the Jewish man passed a sheet of matzah to the blind man. The blind man ran his fingers over the matzah for a few minutes, looked puzzled, and finally exclaimed, "Who wrote this nonsense?" [http://www.haruth.com/JhumorPesach.html]

Do you think you know everything about Passover? Then try the Passover quiz. Here's a sample question from Jacob Richman's Humor Pages:

On Seder night, we are supposed to drink wine until...

(a) Uncle Irving's jokes sound new to you;

(b) you can no longer tell the difference between Pharaoh and Moses;

(c) you don't miss bread [http://jr.co.il/humor/passover.htm].

Or how about going a round of Passover Jeopardy (where you get the answer and try to figure out the question)?

The answer: A classroom, a Passover ceremony and a latke.

The question: What is a cheder, a seder and a tater? [http://www.humormatters.com/holidays/passover.htm]

One of the most delightful Pesach sites you'll find is Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Uncle_Eli/Eli.html]. Written in the style of Dr. Seuss, Uncle Eli retells the Haggadah in a familiar yet unique way:

Why is it only on Passover night we never know how to do anything right?

We don't eat our meals in the regular ways that we do on all other days...

Cause on all other nights we may eat all kinds of wonderful good bready treats like big purple pizza that tastes like a pickle, crumbly crackers and pink pumpernickel...

Yes – on all other nights we eat all kinds of bread but tonight of all nights we munch matzah instead.

Passover wouldn't be the same without its wonderful songs. But if you are looking for a break from Dayenu or Chad Gadya, there are plenty of new tunes to try out such as There's No Seder Like our Seder, Afikomen (sung to the tune of Oklahoma) and the best of the bunch, Our Passover Things:

Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes

Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes

Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings

These are a few of our Passover things. [http://kosher4passover.com/parodies.htm]

But before we conclude, a holiday health warning for you: [http://www.fortunecity.com/millenium/southwater/113/jewish_humor_13.htm]

Did you know that a group of leading medical people have published data that indicates that seder participants should not partake of both chopped liver and charoses? It is indicated that this combination can lead to... Charoses of the liver!

What can we do?

When darkness falls we respond with light.

When Jews are indiscriminately targeted for death -
We respond with deepened unconditional love for each and every Jew.

When the Land of Israel comes under assault -
We respond with redoubled commitment to our home, our heritage.

When the future appears bleak and uncertain -
We respond with strengthened faith, optimism and vision.

We shall not stand by paralyzed.

We will love deeper.
We will commit more determinedly.
We will believe more passionately.
And above all

We will do more.

For with every mitzvah, we change the world for good.
Ultimately, darkness will be transformed into light;
evil will be sublimated into goodness.

We can do it. The time is now.

'Stabilization' seen as best hope for Mideast

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although the current "war process" between Israelis and Palestinians is ultimately not sustainable for either side, a ceasefire alone is not enough, says Dennis Ross, former American envoy to the Middle East.

"We need to change the structure of the reality so a ceasefire will endure, and as it endures, then you can begin to transform the psychology... We have to re-establish a climate in which peace-making becomes legitimate again," he said at a press conference last week at the Park Hyatt Hotel.

Right now, said Ross, Israelis and Palestinians alike no longer believe they have a partner for peace. Palestinians believe Israelis don't want to give up control of the Palestinians, and Israelis believe Palestinians are not interested in peace, he said.

"At some point we will get back to peace-making," said Ross, who becomes director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a policy-oriented think tank, this spring. "We have to learn the lessons of the past and understand what to do, what to avoid, and what it will take."

The former envoy – who was in town to speak at a dinner for donors to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's challenge fund (a fund created last summer in response to the crisis in Israel) – is writing a book to address those issues. The Missing Peace, which he expects will be published next winter, will draw on his 12 years of experience during the administrations of former U.S. presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton.

Part of Ross' intention in writing the book is to set the record straight. To this day, he said, Palestinians have not been honest with their own public about what has been offered to them. "They say they were offered cantons, that there wouldn't have been a [Palestinian] state that was contiguous in terms of territory... that's all simply untrue."

Under the American proposal put forth at Camp David and accepted by Israel, the Palestinians would have received 95 percent of the West Bank, and the Arab neighbourhoods of East Jerusalem as the capital of their state, Ross said.

The Israelis rejected the idea of a right of return for Palestinian refugees to Israel, he added – "understandably... because that's the end of the Jewish state." A two-state solution would include right of return for Palestinian refugees to their own state.

In the Mar. 16 issue of the Washington Post, Ross outlined a four-part proposal he believes would effectively address the conflict.

Under his plan:

- the United States would ask Israel to halt its attacks on the Palestinians for 10 days. Should Israel learn of a planned terrorist attack during that time, it would inform Palestinian security forces and the U.S. If the Palestinians did not act immediately, Israel would have the right to do so.
- The Palestinian Authority (PA) would try to prevent acts of terror and violence against Israelis and begin to make "real, not fake, arrests" and dismantle terror organizations.
- The United States would reconstitute its Committee on Verification and Monitoring mandated by the 1998 Wye River Agreement. It would meet daily during the 10 days to discuss necessary steps. The United States would also make sure its allies were prepared to join in a denunciation of the side not fulfilling its commitments.
- The Israelis, Palestinians, Egyptians, Jordanians and Saudis would send representatives to Washington, D.C., at the foreign minister level to work out a six-month timeline of steps to be taken.

Ross believes that PA Chairman Yasser Arafat has the power to implement the necessary measures. "It is not a case of capability. It is a case of will," Ross said.

Over the past 18 months, the Palestinian areas have been a safe haven for those who want to kill Israelis, he said. Based on discussions he has had with Palestinian representatives, Ross believes that can change if Israel lifts its "siege" on the Palestinian population. In the year that preceded the current intifadah, Israel did not suffer a single fatality from terror, because the Palestinians were doing their job, he said.

A significant component of Ross' plan would involve accountability for not living up to the agreement. Arafat needs to be in a position where it's clear what he has to lose – international acceptability – and also clear that he has something to gain, Ross said.

Dennis Ross
[Big Dipper Communications]

If you don't break the cycle of revenge, he said, you "create a psychology where the most extreme ideas become acceptable." Incitement has to stop, and relatively early on in the plan, he said.

Israel has hard choices to make, said Ross. "In the last 17 months, Israel has ratcheted up the level of force they're using against Palestinians. If I thought the use of force would work, I would support it, but I don't see a military solution. I see a paradox. I see greater use of force, and less security."

One thing Arafat could do "like this," said Ross, snapping his fingers, "is change the media. He doesn't have a free media."

In a best-case scenario, Ross envisions a "stabilization" of the situation with a "political process that re-establishes the idea that peace negotiations are not only credible but the only way to do business... I don't believe a final deal is in the offing right now."

What is more likely, he said, are periods of stability marked by periods of violence.

On a global scale, Ross does not believe the war on terror can be won as long as Iraq's Saddam Hussein is in power. "We can't start and fail."

New yeshiva hopes 'to develop future leaders'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Yeshiva Darchei Torah of Toronto opened its doors last summer to high school and university students with Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz as rosh yeshiva.

The school opened with full yeshiva and general studies programs in grades 9, 10, and OAC. (It plans to add a Grade 11 class next year.) Its general studies department has two separate tracks for sciences and humanities.

"Our immediate aim is to create a warm, stimulating environment for the spiritual, intellectual and social development of our talmidim," said Rabbi Breitowitz. "Our long range goal is to develop future leaders – both religious and lay – in the Jewish community."

The staff includes three PhDs and several members with graduate degrees. Among the staff are Rabbi Dovid Sapirman, Rabbi Mordechai Rapoport, Rabbi Dovid Kestenbaum and Rabbi Meir Joshua. William Brown is the general studies principal and Rabbi Avigdor Hyman is the executive director.

The school also accommodates students who attend university. They study at the yeshiva in the morning and go to university classes in the afternoon.

The yeshiva is located in the Eglinton-Dufferin area at the D. B. Hood Community School. The classrooms are bright with 15-foot ceilings, and the school boasts a computer lab and kosher catered meals. Transportation is provided daily from as far away as Thornhill.

In an interview, Rabbi Breitowitz was asked why Toronto needs another yeshiva.

He explained that he was associated with Beit Yitzchak, a yeshiva in Hamilton that is now closed. Although the school was a success, most of the students and staff were from Toronto.

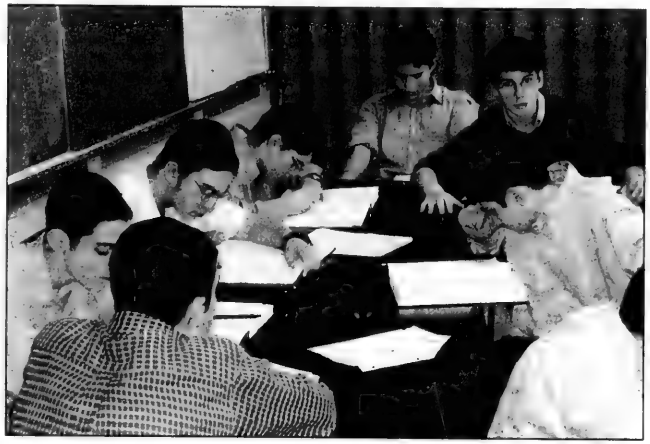
"Rabbi Morton Green, who established the yeshiva, felt that future growth necessitated the involvement and support of the broader Toronto community." The board of directors, with input from the parents, made the decision to reconstitute the yeshiva in Toronto, Rabbi Breitowitz said.

"Schools are constantly redefining themselves," he said. "There is a niche in the community for our yeshiva.

"We are down to earth in our expectations. Along with a high level of religious commitment, we believe that boys are boys and require guidance in their character development and learning skills."

He stressed the importance of providing students with the skills to make career choices. "They must be prepared to enter the secular world."

The school, which has 51 high school students and 12 university students, is open 5½ days a week and its day generally begins at 7:30 a.m. and ends at 8 p.m.



Students at Yeshiva Darchei Torah.

Within two years, Rabbi Breitowitz said, the yeshiva projects its enrolment will increase to 80 students and include all the high school grades. "And we hope to be able to provide the option of dormitory facilities in the future."

Michael Halbert, one of the yeshiva's founders, who hopes to send his children to Darchei Torah when they are old enough, told The CJN that the "yeshiva's overall operating style incorporates a personal concern by leading staff members for each student's welfare, bound by an overall strong sense of school spirit and, of course, respect for teachers and fellow students."

He added that "the school is still something of a secret in Toronto – and Rabbi Breitowitz is an absolutely stupendous mentor."

Lombardi was a pioneer of multicultural radio

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Johnny Lombardi, the son of Italian immigrants and owner of CHIN Radio who pioneered multicultural radio in Toronto and served the needs of more than 30 communities, died March 18 from complications of pneumonia. He was 86.

Obituary

The legendary broadcaster was raised near College and Grace streets in Toronto and lived in the Little Italy area all his life.

He fought for Canada in World War II, serving in Normandy, Belgium, Germany and Holland. After the war, he became a producer with CHUM Radio.

In 1966, he formed CHIN Radio with an inclusive mandate, and his name became synonymous with multiculturalism as he helped foster the development of Toronto's multicultural fabric.

He also gave Toronto the annual CHIN International Picnic that brings together thousands of people – young and old – from every part of the community.

A musician and entrepreneur in addition to being a longtime broadcaster, Lombardi was also a member of the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario, and a recipient of Toronto's Civic Award of Merit.

Ed Morgan, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and a law professor at the University of Toronto, said Lombardi created space on the airwaves for Jewish and other ethnocultural programming, "which is now a major part of radio and television.

"We will remember him for putting multiculturalism into practice and making it more than just a slogan."

Speaking to The CJN, Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman called Lombardi "a great citizen and a pioneer of multiculturalism." He said the flamboyant CHIN owner "showed people they've got to be proud of what they are and who they are and he will always be remembered for that."

In a statement, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien said "Johnny Lombardi was immensely likable and absolutely unforgettable. I will miss him a lot."

Lombardi, Chrétien said, "embodied and gave public voice to the rich cultural diversity that is so much a feature of everyday life in Toronto, and, indeed, throughout Canada... he dedicated his life to enabling all of our cultural communities to express pride in their origins and their love of Canada."

Lombardi is survived by his wife, Lena, as well as three children and five grandchildren.

Anti-Semitic discrimination at U of T lingered, book claims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A major hospital and an exclusive social club that were both associated with the University of Toronto tried to exclude Jews as late as the 1950s and 1970s, respectively, according to a new book about U of T.

Martin Friedland, the university's former law dean, discloses these revelations in his book The University of Toronto: A History, published by University of Toronto Press earlier this month in honour of the school's 175th anniversary.

The Toronto General Hospital, which is affiliated with the university, had a policy of excluding Jews from internships or staff positions.

Under pressure from its head of medicine, R.F. Farquharson, the hospital broke that barrier by hiring Barnet Berris as an in-house doctor in 1950.

Berris remained at the hospital for 14 years, and was subsequently chief of medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital.

In 1962, the university appointed Ernest Sirluck as dean of humanities and social science at its school of graduate studies.

He was the first Jew to land a senior position at U of T.

Nevertheless, Sirluck was quietly excluded from membership in the York Club, where some university meetings took place.

Sirluck had, in fact, been invited to join the York Club. As Friedland puts it: "According to his autobiography, he accepted and was to be notified of the next vacancy. Some time later, he wrote, he was lunching at the club (as the guest of the university's president), when the chairman of the club's membership committee started chatting with him.

"'What is your background? Norwegian?' Sirluck was asked. 'No, Sirluck replied, 'Russian-Jewish.' After that, Sirluck noted, 'I never heard from the club about my election to membership.'"

In 1970, Friedland adds, a similar fate befell Charles Hollenberg, the university's first Jewish chair of the medical faculty and the first Jewish chief of medicine at the Toronto General Hospital.

Hollenberg's appointment was a breakthrough, notes Friedland, who was the university's first Jewish law dean, from 1972 until 1979.

"Considering the historical reluctance to hire Jews at the hospital, the significance of Hollenberg's appointment cannot be overestimated," writes Friedland.

Prior to 1970, only white Anglo-Saxon Protestants would have been considered.

Friedland goes on to say that trustees of the Sir John and Lady Eaton chair of medicine resisted Hollenberg's appointment.

"The members of the university board of governors, however, persuaded the trustees that to deny [Hollenberg] the chair would be embarrassing to everyone concerned."

Friedland also suggests the faculty of medicine curtailed enrollment in 1942 so as to limit the influx of Jewish students.

Martin Friedland

"The medical faculty's admission committee specifically refers in its minutes to the 'serious problem' of Jews in the medical school, and notes 'the almost vitriolic criticism from parents and others on… the large number of Jews."

Friedland concludes: "It appears reasonably clear from both the anecdotal and the statistical evidence available that discriminatory practices prevailed for a period of time – at least a dozen years – after the new policy was introduced."

In a revealing footnote, Friedland adds that one of his researchers, Charles Levi, accidentally found a memo from Robin Ross, the university registrar, to Claude Bissell, the university president, making it clear that discrimination existed in the faculty of medicine.

Dated Dec. 4, 1959, the memo states: "There is a definite limitation imposed by the selection committee on the number of Jewish students whom they are prepared to accept in the pre-medical years.

"There are, of course, solid practical reasons for the restriction and I am the first to sympathize with the Council in what is an awkward dilemma.

"Against that, however, is the very real danger that the university can be charged – and rightly so – with exercising the very kind of discrimination that we disavow publicly."

There is no record of Bissell's response, either in his papers or diaries.

Another footnote discloses that the faculty of medicine, in 1949-50, accepted 57.8 percent of non-Jewish applications, but only 45.5 percent of Jewish applications. The figures for 1951-52 were 44.7 percent and 48.3 percent, respectively.

Before King's College changed its name to the University of Toronto, it rejected a job application from James Sylvester, a brilliant Jewish mathematician.

Sylvester went on to become the Savilian Professor of Mathematics at Oxford University and the winner of the highest prize awarded to British mathematicians, the Copley Medal of the Royal Society.

King's College did hire a Jew, Jacob Hirshfelder, as a tutor in Hebrew, but only because he already had converted to Christianity.

It was not until 1930 that the university hired the first full-time Jewish lecturer. He was Jacob Finkelman, in the faculty of law.

After the Nazi seizure of power in Germany in 1933, U of T hired 10 refugee academics, about half of all those hired in Canada. Among them were Hermann Fiedler, an organic chemist, and Leopold Infeld, a theoretical physicist.

Frederick Banting, the eminent U of T scientist and Nobel Prize laureate, brought two Jewish scientists to his laboratories.

Yet Banting, the discoverer of insulin, harboured anti-Semitic feelings. In the 1920s, Friedland writes, he reportedly said, in a reference to his specialty, "If I'd known so many Jews had diabetes, I don't think I'd ever have gone into it."

In an interview, Friedland said he was not really shocked by the anti-Semitism that once pervaded the U of T.

"The university wasn't different than society at large, and there was probably less anti-Semitism at the university than in the legal profession, banks and corporations."

Discovering that you are suddenly Jewish

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A woman who is happy she converted to Judaism told the story of how she learned that she was born in Raoul Wallenberg's bed in Budapest a few months before he was arrested by the Russians.

Speaking recently at a program at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Yvonne Singer, 51, an associate professor at York University, said she discovered that surprising fact in an article about Wallenberg that appeared in a Toronto newspaper. The article named Singer's mother as one of the people Wallenberg had assisted.

Woman discovered she was born in Wallenberg's bed

Intrigued, Singer, who was raised as a Christian, went to Budapest, where she found papers indicating that her parents were married in a synagogue there.

When she confronted her parents, they denied that they were married in the synagogue.

Until his death two years ago, her father never admitted his Jewish connection, Singer said, adding that she still finds it too difficult to discuss the matter with her mother.

Singer's story is told in the book Suddenly Jewish, by New Jersey author Barbara Kessel. The book is based on interviews with 160 people who were raised as non-Jews and learned at some point in their lives that they are from Jewish backgrounds. It describes how they reacted to that discovery.

Singer, an artist who is currently exhibiting a number of multimedia works, has converted to Judaism. She is married to a Jew, although, she said, he was originally willing to have their wedding in a Unitarian church. They have four daughters who were given Hebrew names.

In Canada (they arrived in 1949 when she was five), Singer said, the family lived for many years in Jewish areas of Montreal. She said she faced discrimination because she had a Hungarian background but was not Jewish.

Kessel, 51, who also spoke, said she interviewed 225 people before writing her book, including a Benedictine monk who now has six children, two nuns, and several rabbis and priests.

She said that in organizing the interviews, she classified them in categories, including crypto-Jews (who practised their religion privately), hidden children and children of survivors.

She said for many, the conversions to Judaism were "life affirming."

The other speaker was Dr. Anthony MacFarlane, a black physician from Hamilton who earned his MD at the University of Toronto. Born in Jamaica, MacFarlane has converted to Judaism and is a member and former president of Temple Anshe Shalom.

The evening was sponsored by the Albert and Tenmy Latner Jewish Public Library and the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

BAYT mikvah reopened

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) recently opened its newly renovated mikvah, the Maddie Leventhal Mikveh Centre, named for the healing practitioner, massage therapist and labour coach who died in 1998.

Leventhal would surely have appreciated the mikvah centre that bears her name, says her sister, Moira Kirzner.

"Water was important to her. She loved to live close to the water; it was an important symbol for her as a life-giving force."

The mikvah dedication is doubly appropriate, Kirzner says, since women go to a mikvah once a month after menstruation, as well as after childbirth, to prepare themselves spiritually for childbearing, a fitting tribute to Leventhal, who helped bring hundreds of babies into the world.

The mikvah at BAYT "specializes in working with women who aren't necessarily observant," Kirzner says. Women come from diverse backgrounds, "brides and others for whom this might be their first or only [mikvah] experience," and find attendants committed to balancing traditional observance with warmth.

"Maddie was a nurturer, too," she says. "She epitomized chesed [acts of loving kindness]."

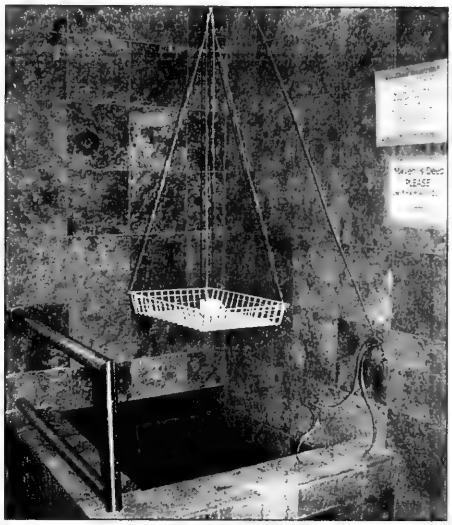
The facility also has a smaller mikvah, a keilim mikvah, used for tvilat keilim, the practice of immersing new dishes and cooking utensils known in Yiddish as toivelling.

The two practices are in a sense related, Kirzner says. The mikvah is not about physical purification, but about "the transition from spiritual impurity to spiritual purity."

Since the Jewish table "is a holy mishkan, an altar," she explains, "we imbue our dishes with spiritual properties. Similarly, when women use the mikvah, the goal is to return to a naturally pure spiritual state."

The mikvah represents healing, a touch of sanctity in a mundane world, Kirzner says. This is appropriate, because "Maddie was powerful in her... love of children and the elderly, the terminally ill – she had a real healing touch for all living things."

Mikvaot are often used by men before Yom Kippur, and in some communities, men immerse themselves each Friday before Shabbat. This purification is not linked to any biological process, Kirzner says, but is a means for men to achieve the higher level of spiritual purity demanded by the holy day. She adds that the mikvah is also essential in the final stages of conversion to Judaism: the convert symbolically sheds his or her non-Jewish "skin" and emerges whole and pure, a newborn Jewish soul. On occasion, the Leventhal mikvah is used for both of these purposes.



The renovated mikvah for dishes at BAYT.

The fixtures and decor in the new mikvah reflect a soothing, natural motif her sister would have appreciated, Kirzner says. Its walls are stone and its ceramic tile is a warm sandy-brown, reminiscent of ancient resonances and harmonies. It incorporates "a feeling of the earth, the natural environment, through the use of the tile, nuances of the light."

This physical beauty reflects its deeper purpose, that of allowing Jews, male and female, to reconnect with the Source of life. There's no better way to keep her sister's spirit alive than by linking it to these ongoing processes of Jewish life, she says.

Transform yourself at seder: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The purpose of the seder is to transform your soul, says Rabbi Lawrence Kelemen of Jerusalem.

We must truly appreciate what God did for us by taking us out of Egypt and view the Exodus, as the Haggadah says, "as if I myself left Egypt," said Rabbi Kelemen at a recent lecture at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

Rabbi Kelemen, professor of education at Neve Yerushalayim College, is the author of the recently published To Kindle a Soul, a guide for parents and educators.

The mitzvah of the seder, according to the Rambam, Rabbi Kelemen said, is not to delve into the most complicated commentaries on the Haggadah – it is simply to tell the story, like a father tells a story to a child.

"The more involved one gets in the telling, the more emotional and passionate the telling, the more praiseworthy it is," the rabbi said.

The purpose of existence, he said, is not to find enlightenment. It is to refine ourselves so that we may become perfect human beings, b'tzelem Elokim (in the image of God). Similarly, he added, the purpose of the seder is not to be enlightened; it is to be transformed, to become a better person.

Real spirituality comes from that change, he said. As an example, he noted, "I used to surf the Internet for eight hours, now I just surf for six. I used to mumble when I made a brachah; now I speak to God."

Rabbi Kelemen quoted the Haggadah, which says, "Once we were slaves to Pharoh, now we are free men." But what is freedom? he asked.

The rabbi illustrated with an example. The slave works every day, from dawn to dark. A money mogul also works every day from dawn to dusk. The difference, he said, is that at the end of the day, the slave has nothing, while the financier has at least made money.

"Freedom is not that you don't have to put forth any effort – it's that you get something for it, something that can never be taken away," Rabbi Kelemen said.

The Rambam explains that real freedom for Jews is recognizing that one should serve God like a servant who works faithfully for his master, and recognizing that every aspect of your life is devoted to the master – to God, the rabbi said.

Every effort should be made to ensure the seder reflects gratitude to God, and to re-create how the Jews must have felt at the first seder some 3,000 years ago, he said.

Dramatize the story, he suggested, like the Sephardim do by putting matzah on their shoulders and marching around the table, or by throwing confetti when reading the section of the Haggadah about the plague of lice, or by putting red stickers all over the face for boils.

Before the seder, he said, review the story and find out more details from midrash so that it becomes more real. Some people, he added, read the first part of the Haggadah before the seder to help get into the holiday spirit.

Rabbi Kelemen noted that only those who appreciated what God had done for them – only one-fifth of the Jews who were there – left Egypt and journeyed to the seminal experience at Mount Sinai.

For a split second at halachic midnight (exactly halfway between sunset and sunrise), there is a burst of light (from God), he said.

"You must finish the afikoman before that, so at midnight you will be able to feel a full appreciation of [the essence of God]." If you can feel that appreciation at the stroke of midnight, "you will catch the light and be transformed."

That appreciation will allow us to become the Jewish nation that God wants, which will bring the ultimate redemption, he said.

Women made the Exodus happen, gathering told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women were instrumental in helping Jews escape from Egypt, says Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"Without women none of this would have happened," she said at a recent Passover program sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

She told guests – who began the evening by introducing themselves to their table-mates with a recitation of their matrilineal lineages – that because of these righteous women, Israel was redeemed from Egypt.

The Book of Exodus starts off by introducing us to two special midwives, Shifrah and Puah, Rabbi Goldstein said.

These women disregarded Pharaoh's orders and kept the babies alive, she said. "If they hadn't done that, we would not have had Moses. This was the first recorded case of civil disobedience."

Shifrah and Puah were only two in an entire "underground railroad of women who tried to uproot Pharaoh's regime. As women, they worked together against death and for life," Rabbi Goldstein said.

"There are a lot of incredible women in the Book of Exodus; I urge you to bring these role models into your seder," she said.

In the service that followed Rabbi Goldstein's talk, the first cup of wine was dedicated to the women of Exodus.

"We drink the first cup in remembrance of the five righteous women whose bravery set in motion the events that led to the liberation of our people:

"Yocheved, Moses' mother; Miriam, Moses' sister; Shifra and Puah, the Hebrew midwives; and Batya, Pharaoh's daughter.

"These women, working in concert showed us how defiance can be sacred, and how a few determined and brave women can change the course of history."

The other cups of wine were dedicated to the pioneers who laid the foundation of a new Israel founded on egalitarian principles; to mothers through the ages; and to the future generation of daughters and sons. "May the wisdom that flowed from our foremothers flow through us forever."

In answer to the first of the four questions, why is this night different from all other seder nights, the women answered:"At all other seders, we hear the stories of our forefathers, but the voices of our mothers are silent.

"Tonight they will be heard. At all other seders the heroic deeds of our sisters… are kept hidden; tonight we will celebrate their courage."

An alternative list of plagues recited at the gathering included: acid rain; excess waste; anorexia, bulemia and obsession with appearance; violence; drug addiction; AIDS and breast cancer; air pollution; homophobia; racism; and child abuse.

Mollie Katzen offers vegetarian choice

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mollie Katzen, best-selling cookbook author and cooking show host, sees food as an excuse for being with people.

"Sharing a meal does not depend on conversation; it is on a different level of relating to each other," she says.

Katzen, 51, who is known for her vegetarian cookbooks, including The Moosewood Cookbook, The Enchanted Broccoli Forest, Still Life with Menu and Vegetable Heaven, said in a telephone interview from her home in the state of Washington, that from an early age, she associated food with ritual.

"My earliest association with cooking was for Shabbat. There was an order to the food – the meat, the potatoes, the vegetables – and there was always homemade challah.

"We were cooking in the context of a special Jewish event. Food was infused into the celebration. When I was six years old, I thought food was holy."

The Moosewood Cookbook, which Katzen self-published in 1974, began as a journal she hand-wrote in high school. "I sold it out of my car. It was a result of the love I've had for food since childhood."

When she moved to the west coast from her native Rochester, she says she was "blown away by the abundance of produce. The array of fruits and vegetables was stunning. Where I grew up, there were about three items in the produce department during the winter. There was no such thing as opposite season produce."

As a painter – she graduated from the San Francisco Art Institute – she was inspired by the visual appeal of the produce, and she kept illustrated journals. Her book, Still Life with Menu, evolved from these journals, she says.

Surprisingly, she says, she is not a vegetarian. "I love vegetarian food and it is the mainstay of my diet, but I have nothing against eating meat. It is natural for humans to eat it."

The original human diet was garden-based, Katzen says, "but after a successful hunt, they ate a bit of meat. That is how I eat. After a 'successful hunt,' I will partake."

She worries about people who believe they can control their destiny through food, she says. "We can eat well, but we cannot control our destiny; we can only do our best. Eating well will increase our chances of good health, but we may as well enjoy ourselves."

Her newest book, Sunlight Cafe, due out in the fall, "praises the benefits of breakfast. I'm not a nutritionist, but I know that how you eat in the morning can affect your whole day."

This Passover, she says, when people come to her home to eat, they can expect plenty of vegetarian food choices. "I respect people who don't eat meat, and that respect shows up in my cooking."

She offers the following vegetarian recipes:

NOT-CHICKEN SOUP

This broth is about as close as you'll get to chicken soup without using chicken, says Katzen. "The garlic is essential. It seems like a lot, but it will tone itself down considerably as it simmers.

"The parsnip, however, is not essential, and may be omitted. It gives the broth a sweeter taste, which you may or may not prefer. The broth can be made up to several days in advance and stored in a tightly closed container in the refrigerator."

8 cups water
2 tsp. salt
1 8-in. parsnip, cut in chunks (optional)
2 large carrots, peeled or scrubbed and cut in chunks
2 medium-sized onions cut in chunks
8 to 10 medium-sized garlic cloves, halved
2 stalks celery, coarsely chopped
2 scallions (optional) handful of mushrooms, cleaned and stems trimmed ½ tsp. turmeric
black pepper

Combine everything in large soup pot. Bring to boil, lower to a simmer and partially cover. Cook slowly for about 1¼ hours. Turn off heat and let it cool to room temperature. Strain out and discard all vegetables. Heat broth gently just before serving. Serves 8.

PEAR AND PRUNE TSIMMES

The tsimmes can be assembled up to a day before it is baked and served. Cover tightly with foil and refrigerate.

10 ripe juicy pears
1 lb. pitted prunes
4 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. honey
cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9 x 13-inch baking pan. Peel and slice the pears. Halve the prunes. Spread the pear slices in the prepared pan, and place the prunes on top. Drizzle with lemon juice and honey and sprinkle liberally with cinnamon. Bake covered for 30 minutes and uncovered for another 20. Serve hot or warm, as a side dish. Serves 6-8.

DIRECTOR

BRONFMAN ISRAEL EXPERIENCE CENTRE

The mission of the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre (BIEC) is to organize and carry out meaningful educational trips to Israel for youth and young adults.

BIEC operates under the auspices of the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre. BIEC was created by FEDERATION CJA in the belief that those who return from a trip to Israel will have a stronger personal and spiritual connection to Judaism, their communities, and Israel.

The Director of BIEC is the Centre's professional leader, charged with overall responsibility for its operation. These responsibilities include: ongoing development of vision, mission and strategic planning; program development; financial management; financial resource development; supervision of staff; advocacy for Israel Experience; and representation and liaison with pertinent local, national and international organizations.

The successful candidate has a university degree in a related field and at least five years work experience, including management experience. He/she possesses excellent interpersonal skills in relating to young people, volunteers and professionals; a commitment to Judaism, the Jewish people and the State of Israel. Fundraising experience is an asset. Strong oral and written communication skills in English and French are required.

Please send your resumé, with a cover letter outlining your suitability for this position by April 15, 2002, to the address below. Only those candidates granted an interview will be contacted.

Children abducted from Israel by their own parent . . . a shocking but true story for Pesach

This is a very recent story about an Israeli mother who left Israel for Canada with five of her Israeli children. It was supposed to be a school holiday: a brief vacation. But when the woman was scheduled to return, she refused to do so, against the wishes of the children's Israeli father.

The mother claimed she was escaping from Israel's current violence that put her children in severe physical and psychological danger. The father claimed that the children belonged in Israel, that the mother's claims were grossly exaggerated and that she had fraudulently obtained his consent for her to vacation with the children in Canada. He argued that at the time she had asked him about vacationing in Canada and had secured his approval to do so, she clearly intended to remain there.

There is an international family treaty to deal with such disputes. This treaty was signed by over 100 countries, including Canada and Israel. It's called the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, also known as the "Hague Convention".

Whomever may be correct morally about the merits of this case, it is now obvious that Arafat and his terrorists are having their effect on international family law — big time.

Pesach is perhaps the best moment to tell this story. This will become clear in due course.

I recently represented the father, an Orthodox Jew, in a Toronto Family Court. Let us call him Yitzak and his wife Helen (not their real names). I've changed the names and withheld certain key details to protect the parties' identities, especially the children. (If you require a copy of the Ontario Court's decisions for legitimate legal research reasons then you may contact my office.)

Yitzak and Helen made aliya to Israel in the '70s. He emigrated from the United States, she came from Toronto. They married, became Orthodox and had many children, five of whom are still under the age of 15, the others not much older. Yitzak became a Rabbi and now works as a social worker. The mother left the older children behind in Israel when she made her "escape", without telling them beforehand why she was doing so. One of them, still very much a student at the tender age of 16, was fully dependent on her financially. The children all have joint Israeli, Canadian and American citizenship. All were born in Israel, raised in Israel and educated in Israeli schools.

As you know, life in Israel is both meaningful and difficult at one and the same time. Although none of the children was ever in direct physical danger, they grew up in a country where there has been considerable anxiety due to a never-ending series of crises. The Yom Kippur War, when the survival of the yishuv was seriously in question; the Gulf War, when Iraqi missiles rained down and Israeli children were obliged to retreat to bunkers wearing gas masks amidst terrifying air raid sirens; the daily grind of infitada of the late 80's, and countless suicide bombers and other terrorist attacks.

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

The core question before the Ontario Court in this case was whether these circumstances brought this case under the exceptions of the Hague Convention. Put simply, did events in Israel constitute a "grave risk of harm" for these children as these words are defined in law in the Convention so as to displace the jurisdiction of the Courts where the children normally resided, that is, the Israeli Courts, in the State of Israel.

Helen traveled widely outside Israel. However, at no time during this violent period did she once attempt to move from Israel with her children. Not once did she ask Yitzak to do so. Not once did she apply to an Israeli Court for permission to move. In fact, Helen signed agreements with Yitzak specifying that the children would remain in Israel unless both parents agreed otherwise. As is often the case in such agreements, each party required the consent of the other party to travel with the children.

Agreement regarding children's country of residence ignored

A few years ago Helen left Orthodox Judaism. The religious differences between the parents led to divorce. When Helen traveled, her trips often coincided with incidents of ongoing violence in Israel. During these trips she frequently left the children in Yitzak's care. When this case went to Court, an Israeli Court and the Government of Israel provided evidence in the Ontario Court that, under Israeli law, both parents shared legal custody of the children.

The kids retained in Toronto were now missing school in Israel, although the mother had registered them in Toronto schools without the father's consent. They were also now separated from their older siblings, friends, relatives, teachers — and culture.

Under the Hague Convention, Canada and its Courts are obliged to return children to the country of their usual residence if that country — in this case Israel — requests their return. Since the father had a legal right of custody, the Israeli government made such a formal request. In the view of the Israelis the mother had improperly "retained" the children under this international treaty.

As agent for Canada, the Ministry of the Attorney General for the Ontario government registered documents in all the Toronto area Courts to open a file and to register the Israeli government's request under the Hague Convention so that the matter would be expedited. This is common practise. The Courts put such cases "on the front burner" because any delay would defeat the purpose of the Hague Convention. The assumption of the Hague is that children normally belong where they come from if the parent "left behind" has a right of custody.

Plaintiff parent and children victimized in many ways

The father was then instructed to find a Canadian lawyer to request the Court to order the children's return. (Neither the Canadian nor the Ontario government undertakes to do this on the individual's behalf, nor does it pay for the service.) Unless a foreign parent can qualify for a Legal Aid certificate or find a lawyer who will accept one (not easy), he must then pay a lawyer for this service.

In this case the time involved led to extraordinarily high legal fees. Moreover, the father was obliged to come to Canada to provide evidence more effectively and ultimately, to accompany the children back to Israel. This cost even more money in airline tickets and lost time from work. The father eventually received a Court order to recover much of these costs from the mother, including the travel expenses for himself and five children. However, whether the father will be able to actually recover the amounts awarded from the mother is open to question.

The mother also timed her decision to stay in Israel on the eve of her husband's remarriage. The mother claimed this timing was purely coincidental, attributing it rather to the fact that the violence in Israel had become particularly intense, with Palestinian violence against innocent civilians occurring almost daily. However, the children in Canada could then not attend the wedding, dampening the joy associated with the festivities.

Meanwhile, the anxiety of the legal action, and travel to and from Canada (twice in a three week period) put understandable strain on the newlyweds. Moreover, when the father arrived in Toronto for the Court proceedings, Helen initially refused to allow the children to see their own father. He was effectively prevented from doing so for a further period of about ten days.

The Court proceedings took place in November and December 2001, over a period of approximately three weeks. Someone invited a media representative (apparently from a major Toronto daily newspaper) to one of the hearings, presumably to attract publicity to Helen's plight. It worked. The headlines and later radio stations took up the mother's cause.

Judges in Canada are not normally swayed by newspaper reports or public pressure. Under the Hague Convention, the Court is almost always obliged to return children to where they usually live if the parent "left behind" has a right of custody. This policy is designed to remedy the abduction and retention of children across borders during domestic disputes about a child's residence. The policy of the Hague Convention is clear and unequivocal: such disputes should be settled by the Courts of the country of origin. Otherwise there would be international chaos — not law. Parents would simply abduct their children and run to a Court in a different land where they believed they might obtain a more favourable result. Very few treaties are followed so consistently by the Courts worldwide as the Hague Convention.

There are some exceptions to this policy of return, but they are narrowly interpreted and rarely successful. Internationally, Courts are legitimately nervous about opening the door to abductions and retentions. They know that every time such an exception is made, it will be used by lawyers defending parents who have abducted.

One of these exceptions is that the children do not have to be returned if the parent can prove that there is a "risk of grave harm" in doing so. Usually, the "risk of grave harm" argument has been successfully used by parents claiming sexual or physical child abuse, or the probability of serious risk of death or harm to them and/or their children by the parent "left behind."

The Ontario Court of Appeal successfully invoked such an exception in a famous case called Pallastro, where a woman escaped to Ontario from California on the strength of such facts.

However, in this Israeli case, Helen used a different exception recited under Article 13(b) of the Convention, a schedule to Section 46 of Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act: A Court is not bound to return a child if: (Continued on facing page)

(Continued from facing page) "...there is a grave risk that his or her return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation."

Helen's lawyer cited some famous decisions in the United States Courts that declared that "war" in a home country may expose children to such harm. By demonstrating how bad the violence had become in Israel, Helen attempted to persuade the Court that war, within the meaning of such decisions, existed in Israel. She provided graphic evidence from newspaper reports and from columnists about daily terrorist attacks taking place on the very days of the Toronto hearings.

Even after she lost her case, Helen brought a fresh motion before the same Judge in an attempt to change his ruling when yet another bomb blast had killed several more Israelis. At one point, she showed the Judge a newspaper report that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had publicly declared "war". (Sharon actually used that term when declaring war on Palestinian terrorists during the Court hearings). Surely, she argued, Sharon's declaration now met the legal threshold for the exception to be applied.

Trying to prove a state of "war" to justify abduction

However, the Judge ruled that, as a matter of law, only the Court had the jurisdiction to decide whether a war in Israel actually existed. In short, Helen's lawyer could not simply quote Ariel Sharon to legally prove a "war" in Israel had exposed the children to a grave risk of harm. That issue was for the Court to determine.

In accordance with the policy objectives of the Hague Convention, Judge Ferrier of the Ontario Court also found that there was no reason why the mother could not have applied in an Israeli Court to permit her to move to Canada with the children. She had provided no evidence to explain her failure to do so.

I also successfully argued that using the mother's logic, any parent from New York City or the United States could abduct their child to Canada and use the September 11, 2001 attack on the World Trade Centre as their rationale for not applying to a New York Court. After all, ten times more innocent civilians died in that one attack than all the Israelis murdered in the past year.

Judge Ferrier acknowledged that Helen had a sincere and legitimate fear for her children's safety. But his decision to return the children to Israel appears to reflect the policy that this fear must be addressed by the Courts best equipped to deal with the issue, i.e. the Israeli Court, not an Ontario Court so far removed from the conflict. Judge Ferrier also rejected the mother's attempt to rely on a recent decision, called Altheim, of a Court in Argentina.

In Altheim, the father abducted a very young child from Israel and retained him in Argentina, using arguments similar to those invoked by Helen. The mother had custody in Israel. The Court proceedings in Argentina took place shortly after September 11. The Argentinean Court then decided to keep the child in Argentina, temporarily, for a few weeks. But, in his reasons for decision, Judge Ferrier concluded that the Argentinean Court still ordered the Altheim child back to Israel (he was, in fact, returned.)

I also successfully used international jurisprudence to demonstrate that no absconding Israeli parent had ever successfully used Helen's argument in any Court anywhere in the world! All the precedents rejected such submissions, be they in the United States, Germany, or Argentina.

There is a principle of mutual recognition and respect between Courts of different lands or provinces about each others' jurisdictions, powers and decisions. This is particularly true with treaties such as the Hague Convention. It is called the "comity of the Courts", and Judges do not normally like to interfere with it.

The story of Helen, Yitzak and their children did not end with Mr. Justice Ferrier's decision.

Helen filed an appeal with the Court of Appeal of Ontario. Since it can take weeks or even months before an appeal is actually heard, Helen's lawyer applied for an Order to temporarily "stay" Mr. Justice Ferrier's decision to return the children until the appeal could be heard. If successful, a "stay" order would temporarily suspend the lower Court's order to send the children back to Israel. Without such a "stay" order, Helen was legally obliged to comply with Justice Ferrier's ruling and return the children to their father immediately.

I had less than a morning to prepare for the hearing before the Appellate Court. We worked furiously. In the hearing, Helen's lawyer made arguments similar to those he had made before Mr. Justice Ferrier. However, Justice Charron of the Court of Appeal accepted my essential argument: if a stay is granted then the very purpose of the Hague Convention will be defeated.

Repeated attempts to overturn the Court's decision

The Hague Convention says that the Courts of Canada must act expeditiously to return the children. Helen's lawyer then asked for a "stay" of Charron's order until five Judges of the Court of Appeal could "review" her decision. However, we successfully argued that this was nothing more than a further attempt to delay and frustrate the intention of the Convention.

While this appeal was being considered, Helen's lawyer made another "last minute" attempt to have Mr. Justice Ferrier change his mind. There had been yet another deadly terrorist attack in Israel, and Helen's lawyer used this as a basis for his last-ditch attempt. Surely now, he argued, the Court should reverse its position.

It did not. All legal avenues for Helen were now blocked. The children's passports were given to Yitzak. On my request, Mr. Justice Ferrier verbally requested Helen's lawyer to tell his client to cooperate in returning the children.

I believe that the Court wanted to avoid any further anxiety for the children. They had been caught in the middle of this dispute for several weeks.

There was only one problem. Helen had disappeared with the children.

Defendant absconds with children in defiance of Court order

Helen went underground. Her lawyer refused to answer any of my phone calls, e-mails or faxes. The police then laid abduction charges and began an investigation to find the children. Some media reports made a spectacle of her hiding the children from "severe danger" in the face of an Ontario Court order. I could not persuade Judge Ferrier to order Helen's lawyer to reveal her latest phone number. The Court decided that such information was protected by the doctrine of "solicitor-client" privilege. However, the Court did order a certain immigration lawyer to provide the police with any information he may have about the children's whereabouts. Someone had taken the children to this lawyer and he had filed a "refugee claim" on their behalf.

He filed such an application even though the children were already Canadian citizens and could not possibly qualify as refugees under the Immigration Act. This lawyer then also tried to confuse the police by complaining that they should withdraw from investigating the children's disappearance in light of this "refugee claim."

The Court was not very pleased with this immigration lawyer's conduct, and was persuaded that the doctrine of "solicitor-client" privilege could not be used by this lawyer. The children were in the legal custody of the father by the Ontario Court's order. Yitzak certainly never consented to retaining this lawyer on the children's behalf. Only the father or the Court could do so; neither was the case.

Ultimately, all the pressure bore fruit. Helen's lawyer sent me a fax indicating where and when the children would be found. Just as Helen arrived to drop off the children, the police arrested her. The children were returned to their father, who promptly left Canada with them. The mother is sadly still in Canada facing criminal charges. Her children need her. Her family wants her back in Israel. However, it appears that she cannot return to Israel until these charges have been dealt with by the Canadian Courts.

Yitzak never asked for these criminal charges to be laid, but the Crown is insistent on proceeding with them, although it is currently reviewing her file.

This sad tale reflects some of the fallout inflicted upon Jewish families by Arafat and his terrorists. It demonstrates that oppression goes beyond the daily gruesome body counts. Applications under Article 13(b) of the Hague Convention by Israeli parents are now pending in different Courts around the world. A number of parents attempt to avoid the Israeli Courts by abducting their children. Many more are attempting to leave by more traditional and legally appropriate means. The damage to the Israeli family — separated or not — is the hidden consequence of these terrorist attacks.

What can we, here, in Canada, do to help remedy this situation? We are not on the front lines. But we can lobby the federal government to vote more consistently with Israel at the U.N. We can buy Israeli bonds, an excellent and secure investment with a relatively high return. We can invest in the Israeli economy, in its performing companies. We can send money to all the worthy Israeli charities of our choice, such as the appeal to donate for the purchase of bullet-proof vests (phone (905) 882-8725.) We can inundate our Members of Parliament and newspapers with letters of support for Israel. We can call our Israeli friends and relatives to show them our love. We can pray and say Psalms (tehillim) in our synagogues. And we should attend public rallies to support Israel, like the one that took place on March 24 at Mel Lastman Square.

But how do we heal the hurt?

Exercising our civil rights . . . and our rites of Pesach

The faith of the promise of spiritual redemption, of unity among all Jews, of the coming of Moschiach — now, today, in our time — will happen at the Passover seder table. Then we will hug our children, our spouses and all our loved ones a little more tightly. Along with eating knaidlach and matza, all of us will unite to relive the moment of freedom and spiritual responsibility that took place when God took us out of Egypt on the "wings of Eagles" (Exodus XIX, verse 4.) (For fantasy and movie buffs, Tolkien borrowed this metaphor from the Torah when an Eagle saves Gandalf from an evil wizard in Lord of the Rings.)

And when your youngest child sings the fir kashes (the Four Questions), when we open the door for Eliyahu, when we eat the afikomen, when we sing our hearts out together, then, yes then . . . then we will be taken out again. Then we will again be freed from Israel's misery when Jews unite to welcome Him into our homes.

Pesach. This, too, is how we defeat Arafat. Chag Kasher Vesamayach.

Campus speaker's call to violence sparks protest

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish students and community groups are objecting to incitements to violence made by a speaker during a discussion at York University on the Mideast conflict.

Samer Elatrash, a Palestinian student activist from Concordia University in Montreal, spoke to more than 100 students earlier this month at York. He denounced the "Jewish version of Israeli history" and urged the crowd to "support the Palestinian armed struggle against Israeli settlers."

He also described Israel as a colonial and abusive power and concluded by saying "colonialism can only be defeated by violence. It cannot be negotiated with."

The event's featured speaker was Matan Kaminer, 19, one of 62 high school students who have written Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon declining to serve in the army over Israel's actions in the West Bank and Gaza.

Kaminer's speech was also highly critical of Israel and he advocated an end to the country as a Jewish state, but he said Elatrash's call for violence against Israeli civilians was "unacceptable."

Kaminer finished his talk by encouraging the audience to support "the revolution" through pacifist resistance.

The event, as well as a second talk by Kaminer at the University of Toronto that attracted 350 people, was organized by several groups, including the Palestine Solidarity Group, the Hart House Interfaith Dialogue Committee and the Canadian Arab Federation.

Crossed the line of fair debate: Kaye

Jewish Campus Services director Zac Kaye said Elatrash crossed the line of fair debate when he endorsed violence and terror against Israelis and Jews.

Kay said everyone is entitled to express their views, but the propagation of hatred goes beyond that right.

Marc Levy, a York University fine arts student, wrote The CJN to express his anger.

"By uttering his hate-filled commentary, Elatrash contributed to an environment that is becoming increasingly hostile toward Israel, Zionists and Jews at York University," Levy wrote.

"By espousing the virtues of violence, he has created a danger to students... There are already groups on campus who are highly mobilized, some against Israel. To grant them the option of violence as a tool for social change is unconscionable," he added.

In a letter to York University's office of student affairs, Congress spokesperson Lisa Armony wrote that "she accepts that it is the right of student organizations to hold events that examine the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, even when they take a highly critical view of Israeli policies.

"However, speakers cross the line of acceptable discourse when they incite and/or encourage violence against others."

By encouraging students to support armed struggle against Israeli settlers, "Mr. Elatrash was in fact endorsing terrorism against innocent Jewish civilians.

"We believe that words of this nature have no place on a Canadian university campus and could potentially incite acts of violence against Jews on campus or elsewhere," Armony wrote.

Anne Marie Ridley, co-ordinator of York's office of student affairs, said her office has no comment on the issue.

Unlike a prominent group of reservists who have refused to serve in the West Bank and Gaza, Kaminer's group objects to serving in the IDF at all. In addition, while the reservists don't claim to be furthering a personal political agenda, Kaminer was willing to discuss his own at length.

The world's "capitalist elites" are behind the current crisis in the Middle East, he told the York gathering, adding that they "want war to shut down opposition so they can continue to exploit the resources [in the area] and maintain control."

ש'שאר ה'נינו

גידי קורן וחברים

חינה סיכום מצב כפי שהוא נראה לי במרץ 2002:
1) חטרור הפלשתינאי איננו קטן מפעולות צבאיות של ישראל. די ברור שכל תגובה ישראלית מביאה עוד צעירים פלשתינאיים להתגדר לחיות שהידים.
2) לא יהיה פיתרון צבאי לבעיית המסכסוך, כי ישראל איננה יכולה לעקור שלושה מליון פלשתינאיים מהגדה ומעזה.
3) המסקנה של הטאמר לעיל היא שרק פיתרון מדיני אולי יכול להביא לשינוי. מטבע הדברים יש בישראל חוסר אמון מוחלט ברצון הפלשתינאים להגיע לשינוי.
4) גם שרון מבין שאי אפשר לחכות לשקט לפני שיתחיל משא ומתן. עד לפני חדשים ספורים הוא חשב לתומו שחומן פועל לטובת ישראל. עכשיו מתברר בקצב מבהיל שההתנחה הזאת היתה מוטעית ושיש לדבר עם מי שמוכן לדבר.
5) ארה"ב לא תתמוך בישראל אוטומאטית אם לא תהיה נכונות למו"מ. האמריקנים מוכנים לחדש טרוריסטים רק אם הם פועלים במגדל התאומים, אבל לא אם הם מפתצצים מסעדה בירושלים.
6) למרות ששרון עושה קולות של נמר, תפסקת הסיוע האמריקני נגרמת לו לעבור לקולות של שטיח ולצאת מערי הגדה תוך שעות.
7) בקלפים הנרועים שיש בידי ישראל, כדאי לה לחזק את הכוחות הפלשתינאיים המתונים, גם אם מנהיגם הוא עראפת. הטענה שהוא יכול לעצור את החמאס היא אבסורדית, בעיקר לאור העובדה שגם ישראל איננה יכולה לעשות הרבה נגד מי שמוכנים להתאבד ולקחת איתם לשמים יהודים ישראלים.
אבל שישאר בינינו.

רצח בדרך בית לחם
זהו ספר הבלש החמישי של בתיה גור. אהבתי את ספריה הקודמים משום שמסביב למעט מאד בלשות היא הביאה חמון חזויה ישראלית. הספר הנוכחי איננו שונה בכך. הרצח קורה בשכונה ירושלמית שיש בה את בני כל העדות, עם כל הדיעות הקדומות והמתחים והאינתיפאדה ומה לא. אתה ממש מרגיש על המרפסת של השכנית, שומע את כל חרכילות השכונתית. ממש חמימות של בית שחי, עם רטיבות וסירחון קל. מה שכן, יש שם מעט מאד אהבת אדם. אולי זה בא לייצג את איך שגור רואה את ישראל העכשווית.
חקטע של הבלש הוא כמו הרבה דברים ישראליים שמנסים להיראות מקצועיים אבל הם בעצם כאילו, או כמו שהגשש קוראים לזה "יְשָׁרָא בְּרִיךְ". כמו כדורגל ישראלי וסצינות אחבה בסרטים ישראליים. בערך בעמוד 50 אתה כבר יודע מי הרוצח, וגור אפילו לא מנסה ליצור אלטרנטיבה. על כל חמישה עמודים של פטפוטים יש כחצי עמוד של בלשות. זהו ספר שאפשר לקחת לחופשה באי בודד ולהשאיר אותו שם. זוה מה שעשיתי.

חופשה באי

FUGITIVE PIECES -Anne Michaels את אבי קען
אמנות היא אחת הדרכים להתמודד עם זוועה. וכך קראתי את ספר החובה הזה, שבאיכותו ובדרך עיבודו- מקומו על מדף השירה. הכותבת, תושבת טורונטו, משמרת בכתיבתה חוויית שואה. סיפורו של דור השואה והמשכיותו. ילד בן תשע הנמלט מן הגיטו ומאומץ על ידי פרטיזן, מתאר תלאות וקשיים עד הגיעו לטורונטו. התחיינות של החיים הבלתי אפשריים מתקיימת רק בחשלמה עם זכרון המתים. חמוות משמש בסיס לסוד החיים. זהו ספר אהבה יפצא דופן. קשה שלא לחשוב על השלכות השואה, או כל שואה שהיא, על הדור חשני והשלישי. מה היא תרומתנו לעתיד מי שנשללה ממנו חירות- כיצד יידע לאפשר אותה לילדיו? עם בוא חג הפסח יש לנו הזדמנות לחוות את התחלתך של יציאה מעבדות לחירות. בהוצאת McClelland & Stewart.

Diaspora Abandoning Israel

Murdered boy's dad blames PA for fomenting hatred

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Seth Mandell blames the leadership of the Palestinian Authority (PA) for the death of his 13-year-old son who was murdered last year near the family's West Bank village, not the unknown killers.

"I believe the PA has been inciting people to hate Jews since it came to power and that created the environment that enabled these guys to kill my son," said Rabbi Mandell in a recent interview. He was in Montreal by invitation from Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, where he gave a public talk.

"The hatred it expressed was nurtured and cultivated by the PA's official media and educational system," he said.

Koby Mandell's body and the body of his friend Yosef Ishran, 14, were found in a cave last May, near their home Tekoa, about 45 minutes south of Jerusalem. They were bludgeoned to death and their blood smeared on the walls.

Since his son's death, Rabbi Mandell has been speaking to Jewish communities abroad, trying to put a human face on the Israeli victims of terrorism. He said his travels are a way of coping with his loss, painful though it is to recall over and over the way his happy, sports-loving boy's life ended.

"It's better than the alternative; something like this could literally destroy you."

Rabbi Mandell said he wants Jews abroad to know that all the victims of terrorism, like Koby, were real people, not just statistics.

"Over 300 Israelis have been killed; each one was a Koby, each had a story, a family, a community," he said.

He also wants to reassure Jews here that Israel has nothing to be ashamed of in the way it is dealing with the Palestinian uprising.

"Moral equivalency," he said, "should not be drawn between Palestinians who murder innocent Israelis and Israel's retaliatory military actions that sometimes result in civilian deaths."

Rabbi Mandell said he and his wife, Sherri, never wanted revenge.

"We had low-key anger, but we made a conscious effort not to think about revenge... We wanted to see if we could make this a better world instead and thereby honour Koby's life."

He objects to the current portrayal of the escalation of violence as a cycle of tit-for-tat killing.

"I do not believe the Israeli military or Israelis in general are acting out of revenge, but rather self-defence or to save lives," he said. "If the Palestinians stopped attacking Jews, the military action would be over. When Israelis enter Palestinian towns they do not target innocent people. When a civilian is hurt, Israel apologizes. Not one Palestinian leader or civilian expressed any kind of regret to us."

Nevertheless, he said he feels no ill will towards the Palestinians and is careful not to demonize them as a people.

A native of Connecticut, Rabbi Mandell, 51, and Sherri moved to Israel six years ago from Silver Spring, Md. The former Hillel director at the University of Maryland began teaching at Hebrew University, but recently moved into the high-tech business. The Mandells have three other children, aged seven, 11 and 12.

Rabbi Mandell, who grew up secular, became observant during an earlier stay in Israel and came to believe settling in the biblical land was a fulfillment of his faith.

Today he describes himself as apolitical, even more so since Koby's death.

"I regret that my kid was killed, but not about making aliyah. We are not leaving Israel or Tekoa, because that is where my children's friends and community are," he said.

Rabbi Mandell has created a foundation in memory of his son to help other Israeli families who have lost loved ones. To date, it has raised over $700,000 (US). The money will be used to set up a summer camp for the siblings or children of victims to receive mutual support and counselling while enjoying recreational activities.

Opening in June at a kibbutz near Ashkelon, it is expected that between 250 and 300 children aged nine to 13 years old will attend the camp's five-day sessions, he said.

The foundation's other project is a women's "healing retreat" where mothers and wives can relax in a spa-like setting and discuss their experiences.

West hasn't learned from Sept. 11: Fulford

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Six months after Sept. 11, Americans and Canadians are still lost in a fog of cultural relativism and a desire to accommodate an implacable foe that cannot be mollified, says one of Canada's leading journalists and thinkers.

National Post columnist Robert Fulford made the argument in a wide-ranging lecture March 14 at Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue. In an hour-long talk, part of the Asper Foundation Performances Lecture series, Fulford took issue with political correctness, Canada's foreign policy, multiculturalism and the western world's discomfort with the concept of evil.

One of the first lessons learned from Sept. 11, he said, is that "our most hateful enemies are more dedicated, cunning and patient than we ever imagined. I remember at the time a New York policeman saying that we relied on the incompetence of terrorists. No longer can we assume that a highly technological society is superior to an underdeveloped society and their terrorists."

Fulford stated at the outset that he is no expert on military matters, religious history or the Middle East. Rather, he said he was interpreting how the events of Sept. 11 have changed our outlook and where they fit in history.

He said he expected that following Sept. 11, the American public would have demanded an accounting of the policy and intelligence failures that allowed the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon to happen. Instead, he noted, the public has rallied around U.S. President George W. Bush, who has made the war against terrorism the cornerstone of his foreign policy.

Fulford said North America and Europe have learned little about airport security in the last six months. Although a manicure set was taken away from him before he boarded a plane at Toronto's Pearson International Airport and his wife's eyebrow pluckers were confiscated at Heathrow Airport in London, he said he has otherwise seen little change in airport security.

He argued that there has also been little change in intellectual circles. Over the past 15 years, universities have made it fashionable and politically correct to condemn western civilization, he charged, adding that political correctness is a "plague on society" from which no one has been immune.

In such a climate, Fulford argued, anybody can be accused of being racist, imperialist, sexist or uncaring.

"This has created an atmosphere of dread that has affected all institutions," he said. "It is a matter of purchasing social peace at any price, where truth is the principal casualty. We have come to live in fear of giving offence to anyone.

"It is worse than McCarthyism, because you could fight McCarthyism."

Bush's repeated use of the word "evil" to describe Osama bin Laden and his ilk has been a cultural as well as a political statement, Fulford observed.

"Our civilization has abolished the concept of evil," he said. "We have replaced it with the concept of pathology. Bad people have wounded psyches. That makes everyone a victim, even a terrorist."

Fulford compared Canada's attachment to multiculturalism to a religious tenet.

"Multiculturalism views all cultures and religions as equal," he said. "Those who disagree are treated as eccentric or worse."

Along those lines, Fulford said that after Sept. 11, the news media sought out North American Muslims to assure the public that Islam is a peaceful religion, that its extremists have very little support, that "Jihad" means inner struggle and not holy war, and that Islam does not permit suicide bombings.

Yet, Fulford said, not a single Muslim cleric anywhere has spoken up against terrorism and claimed it is wrong.

While the western world has become more open to questioning religion and religious texts over the past several hundred years, the Muslim world has gone in the opposite direction, to the point where questioning anything in the Koran courts death, Fulford argued.

Prior to Sept. 11, Muslim terrorism had been seen principally as Israel's problem, despite evidence to the contrary, Fulford said.

"I think we in the West now have a better understanding of Israel's position."

Canada's modern foreign policy, he noted, was enunciated more than 40 years ago by the late Lester Pearson. In it, we see ourselves as "honest brokers" who listen to both sides, find areas of agreement and try to build on them, Fulford said.

"It sounds wonderful, but what if there are no areas of agreement? What if one side's only goal is to wipe out the other side?

"In the Middle East, we act as if everyone wants peace and it is just a matter of some misunderstanding. That is why our government tries to deal even-handedly with Israel and the Palestinians, while CBC reporters condemn violence on both sides.

"George Jonas recently wrote in the National Post that it has long been our country's belief that we achieve moral stature in the world by remaining strictly neutral in a conflict between good and evil.

"We should have taken Israel's side long ago."

The Saudi plan: real or an empty gesture?

In the CJN's March 7 issue, this column asked how the Saudis could be sincere about pursuing an unofficial peace initiative that seemed to call for normalization of relations with Israel while remaining wedded to fanatical Islamic clerics who revile Jews and call for Israel's destruction. "We may soon find out" were the column's concluding words.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It didn't take long to see the direction events were taking. In only days, the Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), which translates the Arab media, revealed that the Saudi daily Al-Riyadh (all Saudi media are state-controlled) had published a profoundly anti-Semitic article perpetuating a variation of the age-old blood libel, that Jews use the blood of Christians and Muslims to prepare Purim pastries.

The National Post covered the story in both an article and editorial (March 15), though very few other media outlets picked up the story. Recounting other instances of Arab anti-Semitism, the editorial concluded that Arab "offers of 'normal' relations with Israel in exchange for sacrifices of Jewish security" are not to be believed, and "will remain so until Arab governments and intellectuals stop nuturing venomous myths about the Jews designed to direct the hatreds and fears of the Arab masses against an outside enemy rather than against their domestic oppressors."

On NBC News' "Meet the Press" (March 17), moderator Tim Russert interviewed the New York Times' Thomas Friedman and the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol about prospects for the Arabs' normalizing relations with Israel in light of this week's Arab League summit in Beirut.

Friedman disclosed something about the Saudi initiative that he found fascinating, but which might cause concern: when Crown Prince Abdullah divulged his peace plan to the New York Times reporter, he had not even told anyone else in the royal family or anybody else in Saudi Arabia for that matter. For Friedman, Abdullah's plan was a "coup d'etat" meant as a "jolt" to the family – a wake-up call to join the real world. Maybe it's that, or maybe it is an initiative without any meaningful support.

Russert asked Friedman to comment on the backtracking in the so-called Saudi peace plan, about the "profound" difference between "normalization" of relations between the Arabs and Israel, as initially reported, and mere "peace" being referred to now.

"Is it time for the Arab nations to put up or shut up?" Russert asked.

"Oh, it's well past time," Friedman replied.

Friedman went on to boldly predict a "real fight" in Beirut over the future of the Arab world. How genuine that long-overdue internal debate remains to be seen. Of interest also is the amount of attention the western media may devote to the broader Middle East in the wake of the Beirut summit, since it ordinarily transfixes on Israeli-Palestinian affairs. Once again, we may soon find out.

The physical acts of reclining, of eating special foods, of standing to greet Elijah the prophet, help us feel the joy of yetziat Mitzrayim, of leaving Egypt. And, in an affirmation of the importance of peoplehood, we mark this special moment not as individuals but as a community.

In that spirit, we cannot proceed with business as usual during these difficult times. We must improvise a new ritual that marks our present pain, that illustrates our connection with Israel and with Israelis today. Let each of us, as we gather at our seders, intrude on our own celebrations by leaving one setting untouched, by having one empty chair at our table.

Let us take a moment to reflect on our losses from this terrible year-and-a-half. And as we do that, let us not just remember the dead as hundreds of nameless and faceless people, but let us personalize them. Let us take the time to find out the name of one victim of the current conflict, one Jew who cannot celebrate this year's holiday, one family in mourning.

Let us call out the name of Benny Avraham, age 20, one of the Israelis kidnapped by Hezbollah in October 2000, and now presumed dead. Let us call out the name of Koby Mandell, age 13, a young American immigrant brutally killed last May, whose father, Rabbi Seth Mandell, talks about the empty seat at his Shabbat table and shares the pain of watching other boys grow up, watching their voices deepen, their shoulders broaden, their gaits quicken, even as his son lies dead.

Let us call out the name of Ayelet Haschachar Levy, age 28, who was "guilty" of the crime of walking down an alley near Jerusalem's Machaneh Yehudah marketplace – the wrong place at the wrong time. Let us call out the name of Mordechai Schijveschuurder, 43, Tzira Schijveschuurder, 41, Ra'aya Schijveschuurder, 14, Avraham Yitzhak Schijveschuurder, 4, Hemda Schijveschuurder, 2, five members of one family murdered in the Jerusalem Sbarro Pizzeria bombing. Let us call out the names of Shlomo Nehmad, 40, Gafnit Nehmad, 32, Shiraz, 7, and Liran, 3, the family killed, along with three cousins, as they spilled into the streets at the end of Shabbat just a few weeks ago.

And as we call out these names, unlike too many of our enemies, let us not call for vengeance, let us not call for more bloodshed. Instead, as we mourn, let us hope; as we remember the many lives lost during this crazy and pointless war, let us pray ever more intensely for a just and lasting peace.

Information about many of the Israelis killed in the current violence can be found at the Israeli Foreign Ministry's Web site: http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/ home.asp. Click on the "In Memoriam" section.

A Passover Miracle

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

The holiday of Passover commemorates a time when the Jewish people were saved from the hands of the Egyptians some 3,500 years ago. But the Passover that took place in April 1944 led to a lesser-known miracle for one Jewish family in the town of Kosice.

During World War II, in the Nazi-occupied countries, most Jews were unable to escape the Nazis' machinery of death and destruction. For those few Jews who did miraculously escape, the majority attribute it to chance, luck or divine intervention. Yet there are stories of rescue, perhaps only a very few, where logic, a pattern of action and consequence, is very much apparent.

This is one of those rare stories.

Aaron Lorber was part of a family of five living in Kosice, a town located in eastern Czechoslovakia (or eastern Hungary, depending on the era). During World War II, after the occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1938, Kosice was part of Hungary, having been handed over by its ally, Nazi Germany. Moshe Lorber, Aaron's father, was involved in the family business, a prosperous sawmill located in Kosice. The business employed some 100 workers from the region.

Until 1944, Hungary's Jews fared better than the rest of Europe's Jews. Despite the increase in anti-Semitism, Hungary's Jews were spared the worst excesses of Nazi occupation. But on March 19, when the Nazis took over direct control of the country, all this changed. Within weeks, the ghettoization and deportation of Hungarian Jews to the death camps in Poland was being organized – and Kosice was the first town on the list.

On the Sunday following Pesach, rumours circulated that the Lorbers' neighbourhood was to be evacuated next. Upon hearing the news, Aaron's mother, Esther Lorber, started packing; Moshe Lorber went outside to fetch his bicycle.

"Where are you going?" his wife asked.

"To pay the workers – it's Sunday, their regular payday," he replied calmly.

"But what if we are separated? What if we are evacuated before you come back?" she pleaded.

"They worked for their money and I am going to pay them," he answered. "I don't want anyone to ever say that a Jew ran away with their money," he continued. "Don't worry; if we don't meet here, I'll meet you at the place where we are being gathered."

Moshe reached the factory, where a long line of workers patiently awaited him. But two men seemed to be lingering, purposely not proceeding to the front of the line. Moshe feared the worst. Perhaps they had an old score to settle. Finally, the rest of the line was finished, and the two men approached him.

"We have decided to save you," said Mr. Biak, one of the workers. "My friend here, Mr. Oravec, will take you in because his house is on the outskirts of town. They are much less likely to look for you there. But you must hurry!"

Mr. Oravec immediately rushed back to the house to collect the Lorber family. A few hours later, Mr. Biak led Moshe and Esther to the Oravec home, avoiding the rush of panicked Jews hastily heading toward the evacuation location.

The Oravec family of five lived in a humble, two-room house (neither room larger than 7x3 metres), without running water, toilet facilities, a separate kitchen area or a basement. To this they welcomed the five members of the Lorber family – Moshe and Esther and their three children, Aaron, Tibi and Yehudit (barely four years old at the time) – plus three others: Moshe's sister Bertha, his brother-in-law, Leib, and their son, Kalman. The Oravecs moved their entire family into one room while their eight guests occupied the other.

Nine cramped and starving months later, the Soviet troops reached Kosice. For the first time since the day they fled their home in Kosice, the hidden Jewish family gazed at the sun in the blue sky and breathed fresh air.

"The fresh air tasted like whiskey," Aaron, who was only 15 years old at the time, remembers today.

Is that the whole story? We have barely scratched the surface. There were countless other brushes with danger before and even after their liberation. Yet events conspired to save the family from discovery and execution. Each and every time.

Aaron recalls on the day of the evacuation of Kosice, Moshe and Esther were fleeing toward the Oravec home in the outskirts of the city. As they ran, they noticed a Hungarian policeman at the end of the road, stationed by the Nazis to apprehend escaping Jews. Trying to bide time, the couple stopped at a water pump and began to wash their face. A Roma (gypsy) woman happened to be watching and understood their dilemma immediately. She led them down a secret alleyway to safety.

Aaron also remembers the day when another Hungarian policeman, perhaps acting on a tip, arrived in the Oravec household demanding the door be opened to the second room – the one in which the Lorbers hid. When he was told the locked room belonged to the daughter, who was at the market with the key, the policeman dragged Mr. Oravec's wife off in search of the daughter, and then suddenly lost interest, releasing her without further investigation.

And Aaron will never forget the evening when Mr. Oravec, filled with a little too much to drink, started yelling in the streets, "I like Jews! I have no problem with Jews! Why do people cause them so much trouble?"

On yet another night, a friend of Mr. Oravec's, a Ukrainian Nazi, accompanied him home. The two spent the night drinking, with the soldier asking Mr. Oravec all the while to take him into the other room. A short time later, the same soldier returned, broke down the door – but saw nothing. Weeks earlier, Moshe had instructed Mr. Oravec to bring wood from the lumber mill; with it he built a fake wall, and behind it he made room for a hidden passageway, less than one foot wide. The panicked family was squeezed into this space as the soldier's eyes scanned the room. One knock on the wall would have revealed that it was hollow and would have led to their discovery.

Then there was the harrowing morning when one of the neighbours saw Moshe in the Oravec kitchen. The neighbour reported the discovery to his wife. She said, "You think I didn't know. Keep your mouth shut – it's no one else's business!"

And one time, Hungarian collaborators accused Mr. Biak of hiding the Lorbers. He was beaten and tortured, but brave and loyal Mr. Biak did not divulge a word!

Illustration by Aaron Lorber

Finally the day of liberation came. That same day, the Lorbers returned to their old home, where their landlady had moved in their absence. She welcomed them back and immediately began to cook for them. At that time, Russian soldiers were roaming the city in search of booty. Two drunken soldiers barged into the room where the Lorbers were standing. They whispered to each other, and then one asked the other whether anyone knew the time.

Aaron, proud of the bar mitzvah watch he was still wearing, immediately responded. His father grimaced and Aaron immediately realized his mistake. He ran to the kitchen and threw his watch into a pile of vegetable peelings.

But the Russian soldiers were on to him. They ran into the kitchen after him, demanding the watch. When Aaron denied having one, one of the soldiers began frisking the 15-year-old boy. The soldier jammed his finger into the boy's shirt pocket, and cried out angrily as he pulled his fingers out, one of which was now bleeding profusely. (Aaron, an aspiring artist, always kept a razor in his pocket to sharpen his drawing tools.)

The enraged soldier dragged Aaron out of the kitchen toward the front door, pointing a gun at his head, a grim signal of the execution he was planning for the boy. Only the intervention of his fellow soldier – and the landlady, who offered him whiskey, bandages and a few soft words – kept the soldier from shooting the young lad. As it was, the two defenders had to drag the still-threatening soldier out of the house, away from the boy.

These and many other miraculous escapes happened. Yet we still have not addressed the central question of this tale which is, in fact, the very essence of the whole story: why did Mr. Biak and Mr. Oravec risk their lives, and the lives of their loved ones, to save the Lorber family? The question was answered by Mr. Biak one Sunday when he came to visit the hiding family.

"We saved you because you always treated us with respect," he said that Sunday afternoon. (In addition to working at the factory, Mr. Biak would occasionally do odd jobs around the Lorber home.)

"My mother never looked down on any one. She was respectful to all," Aaron confirms as he retells the story.

"And you always paid your workers on time. Not only that, you would give us advances whenever we asked," Mr. Biak continued, as Mr. Oravec nodded.

"The week before the evacuation order was issued, you were especially nice to us. Do you remember? We came to your home asking for an advance, and you, Moshe, answered the door. You apologized, saying it was not possible, it being your Jewish holiday when you could not touch money. [It was during the first days of Pesach.] Just then your wife came to the door, and joined the conversation.

"'Moshe,' she insisted. 'There's no problem. Just take them to the safe, open it up and let them take out the money.' You agreed, and we were able to receive our advance.

"We were very moved by this gesture. It impressed us so much that you were even willing to interrupt your holy day to help us. And that is why we decided to help you."

Why must we tell these stories? So that we remember that even in the "Kingdom of Night," there lived exceptional human beings who followed their conscience, people who defied the Nazi evil and the complicity and silence of their own neighbours. These individuals, it has been noted, saved not only Jews but the very reputation of humanity. And we tell these stories, perhaps, because it reveals to us that – at least some of the time – the universe seems to be unfolding as it should.

Celebration 100

11 Nissan – March 24

Marking the 100th anniversary Of the Rebbe's birth

The Rebbe's Message

From the beginning of the Rebbe's leadership, his message has remained constant: Each and every Jew is invaluable and essential to Am Yisrael, and through each and everyone's acts, words and thoughts, we can and will achieve the purpose of creation and bring the world to perfection.

Moving Forward

The Rebbe's teachings continue to inspire all of mankind. The wide-ranging programs he set in motion continue to grow and to provide for the spiritual, emotional and often physical needs of Jews around the world. The thousands of men and women who serve as Shluchim, his emissaries, reach out to every Jew in all four corners of the world, enriching the lives of Am Yisrael and beyond.

Taking Part

Maimonides states, "One should view the world as hanging in the balance, and the next act will tip the scales for the individual and the whole world." In a similar vein, the Rebbe said, "The era of Redemption is within our grasp... Moshiach is ready to come ... all we have to do is add in acts of Goodness and Kindness."

On the occasion of this auspicious day, let each of us resolve to do one more mitzvah, one more act of Goodness and Kindness. May that deed bring security and peace for our brethren in Israel and the ultimate Redemption through Moshiach.

May we celebrate this Passover with Moshiach in Jerusalem.

Edmonton hosts its first Jewish film festival

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — Despite snowy weather and temperatures of -37 C, four films attracted almost 900 people to the first-ever Edmonton Jewish Film Festival.

Chair Michael Saouli said the goal of the festival, held March 6-7 at West Edmonton Mall's Cineplex Odeon theatre, was to entertain the community and encourage people to think for themselves as opposed to accepting what they see on the news.

"We let the movies do the talking," he said.

Saouli, who is also on the board of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton and a producer for Alliance Atlantis, is proud of the award-winning films in the festival, especially The Believer.

"This was a major coup. It was almost like a stroke of luck," he said of the true story of a Jewish neo-Nazi.

The Believer explores a Jewish student's journey as he tries to understand the meaning of Judaism in his life. The film, which does not have a Canadian distributor because of its strong subject matter, won the 2001 Sundance Festival's Grand Jury Prize for best drama. It will be screened next at Toronto's Jewish Film Festival on April 21.

Saouli says after watching The Believer, most of the audience walked out of the theatre without saying a word.

The Man Who Cried, starring Johnny Depp and Christian Ricci, opened the festival. Ricci plays Suzie, who tries to find her father after he emigrates from Russia. Raised by a British family, her talent for singing and dancing brings her to Paris, where she meets Cesar (Depp), a Gypsy, and Lola, a fellow dancer from Moscow. Following the Nazis' takeover of Paris, Suzie must decide whether she should remain with Cesar or try to find her father in America.

A film from the Czech Republic, Divided We Fall, explores the decisions that a childless couple, Josef and Marie Cizek, make in Nazi-occupied Czechoslovakia. The Cizeks create a safe haven for David Wiener, a Jew and the sole surviving member of the couple's employer's family. They risk their lives as they hide David from the Nazis. Divided We Fall was nominated last year for an Academy Award for best foreign film but lost to Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon.

The fourth film in the festival, One Day in September, won the 2000 Academy Award for best documentary feature for its detailed look at how police handled the Israeli hostage situation at the 1972 Munich Olympics. One Day in September shows footage taken at the time and has interviews with Jamal Al Gashey, the only known surviving Palestinian terrorist involved in the incident.

Saouli said he plans to chair the festival for one more year before handing over the project to another volunteer.

"People loved the movies. The general public said we should have [a festival] every year," he said.

Saouli said he is considering moving the festival to a warmer month of the year after the theatre manager told him the extreme weather lowered attendance by about 150 people per screening.

He estimates the Edmonton Jewish Film Festival will end up netting more than $16,000 to help finance one of the many projects funded by the federation.

Up until 1998, Edmonton had an Israeli film festival that used video projection to show movies, but its highest-ever profit was just under $800, Saouli said.

HELPING A HOSPITAL: Torontonian Atarah Grysman gives a doll to a patient in the pediatric department at Laniado Hospital in Netanya during a recent visit. As a counsellor at Camp Moshava, Grysman had her campers make dolls for the young patients. Starting with the 11th annual Dr. Joseph Weil Memorial Lecture on April 21, Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital, Ontario region, will direct all funds raised locally to Laniado's new children's hospital, which honours the 1.5 million children killed in the Holocaust.

Canada's role limited, says Graham

"Israel's acts are seen in a totally different light. Israel is taking steps to defend itself in extremely difficult circumstances. We have urged only that it do so in a way that moves the peace process along."

He also addressed Israel's claim that it is being singled out.

"I think that is a perfectly fair comment. When I spoke to Rabbi Melchior, he certainly made that comment very forcefully that in their view, it is quite unfair that so many of the resolutions are directed toward one state and nothing is said about other states who have egregious human rights records.

"I emphasized [with Rabbi Melchior] that we will work in consultation with Israel during this session," and Rabbi Melchior expressed the need for Canada to continue to be engaged on these issues, Graham said.

As for battling general anti-Israel bias at the commission, Graham said Canada's role is limited.

"We don't control the whole process there. We are one of a group of states and if the other[s] decide to go down a certain track we can only dispute, object, etc. We can't stop that from taking place."

In a brief submitted last month to the department of foreign affairs, Canadian Jewish Congress said the commission's resolutions "are inflammatory and unfairly place the responsibility for the condition of the Palestinians solely at the doorstep of Israel. There is no recognition of Palestinian violence and terrorism, abetted by states such as Iran and Syria, that in recent months has been responsible for the murder and maiming of hundreds of innocent Israeli civilians.

"The time has come for Canada to end this sham, seize the moral high ground and demonstrate bold leadership in saying that enough is enough," CJC stated. "We respectfully urge Canada to vote against one-sided, inflammatory anti-Israel resolutions on the agenda of this year's [commission meeting]."

Group aids Orthodox youth fight drug, alcohol addictions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — We must do all we can to help young people who have spun out of control, says Rabbi Eitan Eckstein, the founder of a nonprofit organization dedicated to helping Jews around the world overcome their addiction problems.

This belief impelled Rabbi Eckstein to found Retorno, which treats Orthodox youth aged 13 to 18 and adults who have drug and alcohol addictions, eating disorders and compulsive behaviours such as gambling.

Founded four years ago, Retorno's main facility is in Givat Shemesh, Israel, with branches in Mexico, New York, Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Venezula.

Children, even in Israel, are "hanging around, looking for how they will fill the night," said Rabbi Eckstein, who was in Toronto recently to promote the creation of a branch here and to raise funds for the organization.

Peer pressure and curiosity lead them to try drugs or alcohol at least once; personal problems lead them to continue, he said.

"These kids are looking for help. They are suffering, even if they are laughing, and hanging around, burning their hands with cigarettes or cutting themselves," he said.

It is essential to find out the real reasons why they act out, Rabbi Eckstein said, and then find a way to "release them from the burden."

Those reasons might be violence in the home or outside it, sexual abuse or even involvement in the criminal world.

One of the first steps that Retorno takes is what the rabbi called deep therapy. The individual is put in a small, dark room with one chair, for 10 minutes a day. After the 10 minutes, the light is turned on, and the person is told to look at him or herself in a mirror.

"They are afraid to look at themselves," Rabbi Eckstein said. "After four or five days, they open their eyes, and usually cry. That is the first step to treatment."

The program is based on the 12-step approach of Alcoholics Anonymous, and includes private, group and family treatment. The individual is in treatment for seven to eight months, although, the rabbi said, it can be two months until he or she is ready to accept treatment in earnest.

Staff includes medical doctors, psychiatrists, counsellors, social workers and psychologists who are either experts on addiction or are ex-addicts themselves.

"These youngsters know how to wrap ordinary [helping staff] around their finger – these guys know all the tricks, because they have used them themselves," Rabbi Eckstein said.

Each Retorno branch in North and South America and Europe provides support group services and guidance for parents of youngsters having problems, as well as for individuals returning from treatment in Israel.

In addition to deep therapy, treatment includes art, nature, water and movement therapies, as well as creative writing. Rabbi Eckstein also encourages the youngsters to return to religious observance if they have strayed.

It costs $1 million a year to operate the Givat Shemesh facility. Treatment fees are high, at $4,000 (US) month. For this reason, one of Rabbi Eckstein's aims is to be able to provide scholarship money.

Although the promotional literature cites a success rate of 80 per cent, the rabbi admitted that research is considered valid only after five years. However, he said, "I don't take statistics seriously. To me, every success is a 100 per cent success, and every failure is a 100 per cent failure."

For more information, e-mail Retorno at retorno@retorno.org, or call 011-972-2-999-8243 or 011-972-5-377-6877.

Doctor sues McGill in leukemia case

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Barry Mishkin, a 33-year-old physician with life-threatening leukemia, is suing McGill University for $12.85 million, claiming that the origin of his disease can be traced back to unhealthy conditions he worked under when he was a laboratory technician there 10 years ago.

In his suit, Mishkin alleges that he was unwittingly exposed to carcinogens such as formaldehyde and benzene because of an improperly functioning ventilation system in the east wing of the Strathcona building, where he worked in the summer of 1992. He alleges that McGill "knew or ought to have known" of the risk and neglected to make the necessary repairs or to inform those working in the building of the health risks.

Mishkin, who is represented by lawyer Gordon Kugler, says that two other young men, identified as J.B., 28, and L.A., 31, who worked in the labs in 1991 and 1992 respectively, have also contracted leukemia.

His lawsuit states that the statistical probability of a 30-year-old getting leukemia (the age at which Mishkin was diagnosed with acute lymphacytic leukemia) is about .7 per 100,000 individuals. The chance that three young men working in the same place would get leukemia are "so low that it is infinitesimal."

McGill knew, prior to 1993, when renovations were completed, that the Strathcona east wing ventilation system was "either non-existent, non-operational and/or so defective that the building was considered to be a health hazard," he alleges.

The suit contains the text of a speech the former chair of the anatomy department gave in May 1995 at a testimonial event for the former dean of medicine. In the speech, he speaks of renovations needed and those already done to the Strathcona building: "In the east wing, a major ventilating system was installed in the gross anatomy and histology laboratories, thus avoiding the risk of being closed down as health hazards."

McGill has issued a statement denying any responsiblity for Mishkin's medical condition.

"Dr. Mishkin has provided no credible evidence of a link between his leukemia and the time he spent in the Strathcona Anatomy and Dentistry Building a decade ago," McGill's statement reads.

As for his claim that two other former students suffer leukemia, the university responds that this "presumes that there is a link between their condition and his own. There are many types of leukemia, and their causes are unknown."

McGill adds, "Coincidences are not evidence of cause and effect, either scientifically or legally."

It further states that a "major renovation project" was carried out in the Strathcona building in 1992-93, "including work on the ventilation and heating systems... It is wrong to infer from this that the building was unsafe."

The Montreal Jewish community has taken a special interest in the case of Mishkin, who was born here and now lives in New York. Last September, 1,600 prospective donors turned out be tested to see if they might have matching bone marrow. A transplant is Mishkin's only hope of survival.

Neither of his parents, Shaindel and Seymour Mishkin, also a doctor, nor his two siblings are a match.

Mishkin grew up attending Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, where his parents are members.

Drives were held this winter in Riverdale and Long Island, N.Y., where a total of over 4,000 Jews of mostly eastern European ancestry (likely the best match) came forward.

Mishkin's name was also included in multiple drives for donors in other U.S. cities, Mishkin's mother said in an interview.

On March 18, Mishkin was scheduled to undergo a transplant using an imperfect match at the Memorial Sloan Kettering Hospital in New York, she said.

No information is available on who the donor is or what city he or she was from because such data is kept confidential for one year, she said.

The major part of Mishkin's claim is $12 million for loss of earning capacity over a normal lifetime. The lawsuit says that Mishkin probably would have completed a fellowship in gastroenterology, if he had not become ill, and become a specialist in the United States. He calculates that he would have earned approximately $500,000 Cdn a year through to age 65.

Mishkin dropped out of a fellowship program at Yeshiva University's Albert Einstein School of Medicine in New York, the suit states. Mishkin, who is married and has a three-year-old son, graduated from McGill with a bachelor of science degree in 1991. He later studied medicine at Albert Einstein. Before he became ill, he was chief resident of internal medicine at the Montefiore Medical Center in the Bronx.

after 50, and I did not overcome the Soviet KGB to succumb before the PLO."

He recalled how much it meant to him that Jews around the world once added an extra matzah to their seder table for Jews in the Soviet Union.

"This Passover, rather than an extra matzah, let's add a little extra meaning to the seder's closing words: 'Next year in Jerusalem.' For next year, all of the world's Jews should be able to celebrate in peace in Israel."

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Meir Rohem, exhorted the audience to show their solidarity by visiting Israel, investing in Israel and making aliyah. He called the cancellation of Israel trips such as the March of the Living "a tragic mistake."

Julia Koschitzky, chair of the consortium said that those who cannot be present in Israel are expressing their solidarity through activism and prayer.

"These are critical days," she said.

Cantor Yaakov Motzen, rabbis John Moscowitz, Moshe Shulman and Baruch Frydman-Kohl, and Daniel Held, facilitator of the Toronto Jewish Youth Council, also took part in the formal program.

Israel, as well as no Canadian government advisory against travel to Israel and a minimum of 20 participants for the full itinerary.

As of March 11, the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade was advising Canadians to "consider deferring" tourist travel to Israel. It also advised travellers to avoid certain areas.

In Israel, the Jewish Agency and the Ministry of Education are "still saying they feel we can make the trip, but we have to take extraordinary security precautions," said Finkelstein.

Among the alternatives available to the 60 Toronto participants (down from more than 100 before the violence in Israel intensified), organizers are suggesting UJA Federation's Yom Ha'atzmaut Solidarity Mission to Israel next month or next year's Anguish to Hope trip to Poland and Israel for university-age students, under the auspices of UIA.

Last week, some Toronto participants were looking into joining the Montreal group, Najman said.

"Officially, we're keeping the group together," said Seymour Epstein, executive director of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, which is responsible for the March in Toronto. "We're talking about a Shabbaton and ongoing educational programs. The group has been terribly disappointed."

Epstein said he hoped most of the group would be eligible for a "special March," which would run next year. Normally, the Toronto MOL runs every other year.

Winnipeger Morris Henoch, a longtime chaperone for participants from outside Toronto and Montreal, which as of last Thursday included 14 students from Winnipeg and 10 from Calgary, said that two weeks ago, he would also have said the trip couldn't be done without going to Israel. But now he feels that a safe trip – "both emotionally and physically" – can be provided with a revised Poland itinerary.

With the new schedule, the last weekend in Poland will be dedicated to life and rebirth, and there will be additional time in Toronto on the way home for "debriefing and discussion," said Henoch.

"Of course, all the communities had people dropping out after each bombing in Israel. We now have people coming back in. It's a very sad statement, but under the conditions today, that's unfortunately the reality."

Seymour Epstein

Moshe Ya'alon

Ya'alon appointed new IDF chief of staff

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The cabinet Sunday unanimously authorized the appointment of Major General Moshe "Bugi" Ya'alon as the IDF's 17th chief of staff. Ya'alon will take up the post on July 9, in place of outgoing chief of staff Lieutenant General Shaul Mofaz.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said he chose Ya'alon for the position because of his credibility, modesty, directness and professionalism, adding that these are values required by a commander standing at the head of an army.

The IDF's senior ranks see Ya'alon as a professional authority and a personal example, he said.

Ben-Eliezer said Ya'alon has been through the widest range of command posts out of the four candidates for chief of staff. Ya'alon served as head of the elite special-operations force, Sayeret Matkal, head of the Paratroop Brigade, head of IDF forces in the West Bank, GOC Central Command, head of military intelligence and deputy chief of staff.

Ben-Eliezer told the cabinet that the change of guard was taking place as the fighting continued and that consideration had been given to Ya'alon's combat experience and his knowledge of the territory.

Saudi plan offers normal ties, calls for 'just solution'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BEIRUT — Arab leaders meeting in Beirut this week for the Arab League summit will offer Israel normal ties in return for a complete Israeli withdrawal from occupied lands and a "just solution" for Palestinian refugees, according to a draft text.

The following is a translation of the draft text of a Saudi-initiated peace plan, due to be presented for approval at the summit:

The Council of the Arab League, which convenes at the level of a summit on March 27-28, 2002 in Beirut, affirms the Arab position that achieving just and comprehensive peace is a strategic choice and goal for the Arab states.

After the council heard the statement of Crown Prince Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz in which he called for the establishment of normal relations in the context of a comprehensive peace with Israel, and that Israel declares its readiness to withdraw from the occupied Arab territories in compliance with United Nations resolutions 242 and 338 and Security Council resolution 1397, enhanced by the Madrid [peace] conference and the land-for-peace principle, and the acceptance of an independent, sovereign Palestinian state with al-Quds al-Sharif [Jerusalem] as its capital, the council calls on the Israeli government to review its policy and to resort to peace while declaring that just peace is its strategic option.

The council also calls on Israel to assert the following:

· Complete withdrawal from the Arab territories occupied since 1967, including full withdrawal from the occupied Syrian Golan Heights and the remaining occupied parts of south Lebanon to the June 4, 1967 lines.

· To accept to find an agreed, just solution to the problem of Palestinian refugees in conformity with Resolution 194.

· To accept an independent and sovereign Palestinian state on the Palestinian lands occupied since June 4, 1967 in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and with Jerusalem (al-Quds al-Sharif) as its capital in accordance with Security Council Resolution 1397.

In return, the Arab states assert the following:

· To consider the Arab-Israeli conflict over and to enter into a peace treaty with Israel to consolidate this.

· To achieve comprehensive peace for all the states of the region.

· To establish normal relations within the context of comprehensive peace with Israel.

International community urged to support propsal

The council calls on the Israeli government and the Israelis as a whole to accept this initiative to protect the prospects of peace and to spare bloodshed so as to enable the Arab states and Israel to coexist side by side and to provide for the coming generations a secure, stable and prosperous future.

It calls on the international community with all its organizations and states to support the initiative.

The council calls on its presidency, its secretary general and its follow-up committee to follow up on the special contacts related to this initiative and to support it on all levels, including the United Nations, the United States, Russia, the European Union and the Security Council.

Israel to spend NIS 23 million to renovate Western Wall

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The government decided Sunday to allot NIS 23 million to finance improvements and renovations to the area surrounding the Western Wall, as well as to allocate funds to a program sponsoring visits by soldiers and youths to the Wall and its surrounding areas.

According to the decision, the improvements will be financed by the budgets of nine government ministries.

The program, which is hoped to improve "the fundamental and functional condition of the area surrounding the Western Wall, so as to provide visitors with suitable conditions," was initiated by the Ministries of Tourism and Religious Affairs, as well as by the municipality of Jerusalem.

Top Islamic leader calls Palestinian suicide bombers 'holy'

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sheikh Mohammed Sayed Tantaoui, a leading Egyptian cleric and former rector of Cairo's prestigious al-Azhar University, last week praised Palestinian suicide bombers as "holy."

According to Tantaoui, "anyone who blows himself up among aggressors who destroy houses and kill women and children, while defending the honour of our brothers in Palestine is holy, because he blows himself up in the heart of an enemy who is raping his lands, disgracing our honour and killing people."

Tantaoui added that, "if the suicide bomber is in an Israeli town, and it is proved that there are aggressors there and he blows himself up, killing men, women and children, he is also holy, because he cannot distinguish between them." However, the sheikh said that the bombers should not detonate intentionally "among the weak [women and children]" because it did not conform to the tenets of Islam and humanity.

About two months ago, Tantaoui took part in an inter-religious council in Alexandria, at the end of which he signed the council's closing statement that, "the murder of innocents – supposedly in the name of god – is sacrilege of His holy name and disgraces the religion worldwide." However, after participating in the council, Tantaoui received death threats from Islamic extremists, which may have caused him to change his attitude.

Boy killed by Palestinians, not Israelis: report

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A Palestinian boy whose death became a symbol of the intifada actually was actually killed by Palestinian, not Israeli, gunfire, as was widely reported at the time his death was filmed, a German news report says.

German ARD Television said news footage of the death of Mohammed Al Durrah was censored by the Palestinians to make it look as if he had been killed by Israeli gunfire.

The dramatic footage, taken in September 2000, showed the boy being sheltered by his father shortly before being shot dead during a gun battle between Israeli troops and rioters attaking their position at Gaza's Netzarim Junction. The footage was broadcast repeatedly on Arab television and greatly contributed to anti-Israel fervour in the early stages of the intifada.

IDF officials said it was a "grave mistake" for Israel to apologize for Al Durrah's death immediately after the incident.

Algerian compares Israel to Nazis

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The Arab world's assault on Israel in international forums reached new heights – or new lows – in Geneva last week, Jewish observers say.

It was there that the Algerian delegate to the UN Commission on Human Rights repeatedly invoked Holocaust imagery to describe Israeli treatment of the Palestinians.

As the Geneva meeting kicked off its 58th session last Monday, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict once again was expected to garner a disproportionate amount of attention and further harm Israel's international image.

The 53-member commission – which is touted as the world's leading body for protecting and promoting human rights, although Syria, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Cuba, China and Sudan are members – ostensibly strives to bring peace to the Middle East, but its one-sided resolutions continue to prove counterproductive, pro-Israel advocates say.

"There are two parties to this contentious issue, and if one of these parties feels it's bludgeoned and ganged up against – every time and in every international forum – then why would it feel moved to act?" said Dan Mariaschin, executive vice president of B'nai Brith International, whose small delegation in Geneva was led by President Richard Heideman.

"For that reason, it should fall on deaf ears in Israel."

In his opening remarks last Thursday, Mohamed-Salah Dembri, the Algerian ambassador to the UN in Geneva, reportedly said: "Kristallnacht repeats itself daily" against "the ghettoized Palestinian people."

In comments translated from French by UN Watch, he added: "We must end this 'night and fog'" – a reference to the German expression "nacht und nebel" used by the Nazis – "inflicted on the Palestinian population by the inheritors of the Shoah."

The commission meeting, which lasts six weeks, comes amid a diplomatic spat between Israel and UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who recently condemned Israel's "illegal occupation" of parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and whose letter to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon criticizing Israeli policy was leaked to the media.

The commission gathering is the first to discuss global human rights issues since last summer's UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa.

Israel and the United States walked out of that event, charging it had been hijacked by anti-Israel extremists.

In Durban, Israel was accused of "apartheid," "genocide," "ethnic cleansing" and "war crimes." A final document was toned down – lamenting the "plight of the Palestinians" under "foreign occupation" – but the fact that such wording appears in an anti-racism document implies that the Palestinians are victims of Israeli racism.

Israel maintains that the conflict is over politics, not race.

Jewish activists in Durban said they were stunned by the level of vitriol aimed at Israel and the Jews, and talked of being better prepared next time.

'Debate worse than expected'

They expected more of the same at the Geneva meeting, and lobbied various governments with their concerns. But the first week of debate was even worse than anticipated, Jewish observers reported.

This was due to the dramatic increase in bloodshed over the past month of Israeli-Palestinian conflict and to the U.S. absence from the commission, they said.

The United States, which routinely raises its influential voice in defence of Israel, has been relegated to "observer" status. Last spring, the country lost its seat for the first time since the commission was created in 1947, when votes for the three seats designated for western countries went to France, Austria and Sweden.

Many observers viewed the humiliating ouster as a rebuke of America's perceived unilateralism, its disregard for international treaties and its controversial plan to build a missile-defence system.

Washington reportedly lobbied for months to win back its seat.

That campaign seemed to culminate recently with the announcement by Spain and Italy that they were withdrawing their candidacies to fill several new vacancies, paving the way for a U.S. return to the commission next year.

Elections will be held at the end of the current session, in late April.

But with Washington marginalized at the Geneva meeting, Jewish observers suggest it may embolden the Arab world to issue harsher denunciations of the Jewish State.

During the first week, the Syrian representative accused Israel of "genocide" and "massacres of children."

UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Mary Robinson opened the session last Monday, saying, "Palestinians continue to be subjected to a wide range of human rights violations related to the ongoing occupation. Israel also continues to suffer from deliberate killings of civilians."

Robinson, who announced her intention to step down from the post, called for international observers to act "as a deterrent to the violations of human rights in the occupied Palestinian territories and also to promote human security against suicide and other attacks on Israeli civilians."

But Jewish activists were most taken aback by the remarks of Dembri, the Algerian ambassador.

"Must we wait in silence until new death camps are built, new massacres like at Babi Yar?" he said, according to the UN Watch translation. "What about the Israeli soldiers, the true disciples of Goebbels and of Himmler, who strip the clothes from their Palestinian prisoners in front of the cameras of the world and inscribe numbers on their bodies, just as they were tattooed in the concentration camps?"

"By taking the language of the Holocaust and turning it on its head, they [the Arabs] are denying the history and the identity of the Jewish people," said Amy Goldstein, Hadassah-WIZO of America's director of Israel, Zionist and international affairs.

"How are the Europeans going to respond to the hijacking of their history in this way?"

It hasn't, Jewish activists say. Instead, Guatemala was the most sharply critical of the Arab rhetoric.

According to a UN Watch observer at the meeting, the Guatemalan delegate said his country recognizes the right of the Palestinian people to an independent state, but as long as the Palestinians and the Arab states are not encouraging peaceful negotiations, Guatemala will not accept their efforts.

As the 58th session progresses, Jewish activists say they hope that Canada will fill the void left by the Americans.

Israel, U.S. believe Arafat formed alliance with Iran

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The New York Times reported last Saturday that intelligence officials from the United States and Israel recently concluded that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has entered into a new alliance with Iran, one that guarantees the Palestinians millions of dollars in funding, as well as an array of weaponry.

Israel has expressed concern over such a connection, the paper reported, because it would provide the Palestinians with what the Times describes as "a powerful and well-armed patron."

A possible link between Iran and the Palestinians first emerged at the beginning of January, when a covert operation by Israel resulted in the seizure of a ship bound for the Gaza Strip coast. The ship was found to be smuggling about 50 tons of weapons from Iran into Palestinian areas.

Yasser Arafat

The two sides denied, and continue to deny, any ties, but the paper says the United States and Israel now view the intercepted Karine A as one aspect of "a broader relationship."

Officials quoted in the report say the new alliance was secretly arranged by senior Iranian and Palestinian aides during a visit by Arafat to Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow last May.

Ali Khameni

The U.S. officials are reported by the paper as saying that Israel provided the American administration with details of the Moscow meeting following the interception of the Karine A.

The paper quotes a senior State Department representative as saying there is "plenty of evidence to show that it wasn't a rogue operation."

March 18

• Israel withdrew its troops from Bethlehem and the Gaza Strip but left troops surrounding several Palestinian towns and cities in the West Bank due to a high alert for terror attacks both in the West Bank and in Israel proper.

March 19

• Israel must compensate the families of two Palestinian victims of the first intifada, the Israeli Supreme Court ruled. The judges determined that Israeli soldiers killed one of the Palestinians and injured the other in August 1988 in a police action, not in an act of war.

March 20

• A Palestinian suicide bomber killed seven people and wounded more than 30 in northern Israel. The bombing took place on an Egged bus near the Israeli Arab town of Umm el-Fahm, close to Afula.

March 21

• A suicide bomber killed at least three Israelis and wounded more than 100 when he detonated his explosion in downtown Jerusalem. Mohammed Hashaika, 22, had been released last week from a Palestinian jail. He was a member of the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, a militia affiliated with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement. Until his arrest, he had served as a PA police officer.

March 22

• PA Chairman Yasser Arafat appeared on Palestinian TV and, under heavy U.S. pressure, read out, in Arabic, a "vehement" condemnation of the previous day's Jerusalem bombing, as the United States declared the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade was being added to the U.S. list of terrorist organizations, joining Al Qaeda.

Int'l parliamentary body votes to admit Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel doesn't register too many victories on the world diplomatic stage, but last week an Israeli delegation had reason to smile as an international organization of legislators voted to include the Jewish state in a key regional grouping.

In a 54 to 6 vote with 10 abstentions, the 12+ grouping of the International Parliamentary Union (IPU), which includes Canada and most European nations, voted to include Israel as a member. The vote came after years of lobbying by Israel and its supporters and had the strong support of the Canadian delegation, said Irwin Cotler, MP for Mount Royal in Montreal.

Irwin Cotler

Israel's inclusion in the 12+ group will allow it to participate in important committee work and be heard on issues ranging from human rights to terrorism to a resolution of the Mideast conflict, Cotler said in a telephone interview from Marrakech, Morocco, where the IPU's bi-annual meeting took place.

"This is an important victory for Israel," he said. "It gives official standing to Israel as a member... in the world's oldest parliamentary organization. This is a very significant political development.

"I know the Israeli delegation was delighted. It almost gives a psychological boost when the country feels isolated," he added.

Cotler was part of an eight-person delegation of Canadian parliamentarians at the IPU meeting. The IPU was founded in 1889 to bring together legislators from various nations. It has evolved into an organization of parliaments of sovereign states with 142 affiliated national legislatures and five associated regional assemblies. Six hundred and seventy two MPs from 130 countries attended last week's conference.

"The [IPU] is the focal point for worldwide parliamentary dialogue and co-operation among peoples and for the firm establishment of representative democracy," states the organization's Web site.

Its goals are to foster contact and facilitate the exchange of information among MPs and parliaments; discuss issues of international interest; promote and defend human rights; and educate the public on the workings of representative institutions.

Despite the lofty sentiments set out in its mission statement, the IPU had sanctioned the exclusion of Israel from all of its regional bodies. Arab states refused to admit Israel into the Middle Eastern regional grouping – its natural geographic association – leaving it as the only country not included in such a grouping.

Israel's exclusion was seen as "blatant discrimination, an exclusion that was so egregious that fairminded parliamentarians felt it was unfair," Cotler said.

The 12+ grouping, which includes most European and Western democracies, including Australia, voted overwhelmingly in favour of Israel.

Each of the grouping's 41 countries was entitled to two ballots and a two-thirds majority (43 votes) was needed to pass. Both Canadian votes were cast in favour of Israel, Cotler said. Moreover, the Canadian delegation, led by its chair, MP Paddy Torsney, lobbied actively for Israel's inclusion and retired Senator Sheila Finestone was a strong advocate on Israel's behalf at an IPU meeting last year.

The stiffest resistance came from the British delegation, which cast both its ballots against Israel. Sweden, Italy and Australia cast single nay votes, Cotler said.

Despite the gain made by Israel in the regional grouping, the Jewish state was still attacked by Arab delegates at the IPU's plenary assembly.

King Mohammed VI of Morocco, in his opening address, "criticized Israel for embracing the logic of force and killing defenceless Palestinian people," Cotler said. An Egyptian delegate "referred to Israeli 'genocide' of Palestinians" while the Palestinian Authority (PA) representative said Israel was employing "Nazi policies against the Palestinians," Cotler said.

"You had this atrocity propaganda emanating from Egypt, the PA, Yemen and in a lesser sense the king of Morocco. This was a disturbing part of the public rhetoric," he said.

FROM THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

"SMALL WEEKS" – A SUCCESSFUL PILOT PROJECT

Now a permanent feature of Employment Insurance (EI)

The Government of Canada has taken an approach to small weeks of work that will especially benefit people who work part-time or have temporary work; this may result in increased EI payments to claimants.

Small week of work – earnings of less than $150
Regular week of work – earnings of more than $150

Sometimes the amount you earn can vary from one week to another. For example, one week you may earn $220, the next week $80. This lesser week of work can lower your EI benefit rate.

When you qualify for EI and we calculate your benefit rate, we will, where possible, ignore the small weeks completely or take only the best of your small weeks and add them to your regular weeks. This will result in your benefit payment being higher than you would otherwise have received.

IMPORTANT THINGS TO REMEMBER:

- All insurable hours will still be used for eligibility purposes even if they are not used to calculate your benefit rate;
- EI claimants must continue to report all earnings while receiving EI benefits;
- Earnings allowed while on claim are still $50 per week or 25% of your weekly benefit rate (whichever is higher);
- Employers must continue to remit EI premiums on every dollar paid and complete Records of Employment as usual.

Zimbabwe's Jews wary after elections

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Zimbabwe's Jews are facing an uncertain future following the country's recent presidential elections.

With food shortages, the threat of strikes and selected sanctions being imposed added to the country's myriad problems, the mood among the country's 700-strong Jewish community is one of bewilderment.

Many people were "fairly stunned" that President Robert Mugabe was re-elected in the disputed vote "because they expected an outcome that would lead to better days," said Peter Sternberg, acting head of the Zimbabwe Jewish Board of Deputies.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said the March 9 to March 11 election, in which Mugabe won 56 per cent of the vote to challenger Morgan Tsvangirai's 42 per cent, was marked by "numerous, profound irregularities" that thwarted the will of the people.

Zimbabwe has also been suspended from the Commonwealth for one year because of irregularities in the election.

After being sworn in for another six-year term last week, Mugabe called on his countrymen – as well as his African neighbours – to join his fight against Western imperialism.

Mugabe has supported an effort to turn over white-owned farms to black squatters, a redistribution of wealth that has been accompanied by widescale violence.

Last week, a white farmer whose farm was besieged by black militants was dragged from his car and executed. He was the 10th white farmer killed since the Mugabe-backed offensive against white landowners began two years ago.

Sternberg described the violence that has followed the elections as "revenge taking."

He said "the winners now feel that they've got the government behind them and can do what they want – this is not a good trend for any country."

The Jewish community, which at its height in the mid-1960s numbered some 7,500, is a small minority within the country's white minority and has never felt threatened as such.

Most Jews in Zimbabwe are older than 70. While some families are making plans to leave, Sternberg said the majority that would remain have lived in Zimbabwe for most of their lives and can't imagine settling elsewhere.

"They feel they would be a burden on their children. In addition, we have the problem in this country that when one leaves one cannot take one's money, plus the fact that it has been devalued to such an extent that it's pretty laughable," Sternberg said.

"Those that have lived here so long might feel, 'Let's carry on as long as we've got something to eat and the sun is shining,' but if the crunch comes they'll have no choice but to leave," he said. "We hope it won't happen."

Mervyn Smith, chairman of the South African-based African Jewish Congress, said there had been some incidents against Zimbabwe's Jews in the past, though the Jewish community had never felt targeted as Jews per se.

"It was good to observe that there were no anti-Semitic statements made in the election campaign," Smith said. "We continue to be in constant touch with our brethren in Zimbabwe and very vigilant and ready to help in case things should get out of hand. This has been the position for some while."

David Joffe, a regional director of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, was one of the board's representatives on South Africa's observer mission to the elections.

"It was an opportunity to touch base with the Jewish community there," he said. "They feel very comfortable there – they may not always like the politics but most of them are committed to the country, otherwise they would have left a long time ago."

Zimbabwe's Jewish community still maintains three synagogues – two in Harare, the capital, and one in Bulawayo.

Ivor Davis, president of the Harare Hebrew Congregation, said Jewish life is continuing, though there is concern for the country's future.

"We keep the Jewish flag flying. Our shul has daily services and we are getting ready for Pesach," he said last week. "The matzah has arrived and is being distributed... Life goes on."

South Africans call for Israel sanctions

By MICHEL BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CAPE TOWN — Several organizations are calling on South Africa to couple its annual commemoration of a 1961 massacre of blacks with support for "human rights in Palestine" and sanctions against Israel.

Muslim groups from around the country have been joined in these calls by leading political parties and trade unions, as well as some Jews and a significant church body.

Marches took place last week in Cape Town and in Johannesburg, and a full-page advertisement in the Johannesburg Star newspaper called for people to march on the Israeli and United States embassies in Pretoria on March 21, South Africa's Human Rights Day.

The organizers of the Pretoria march included the African National Congress and its two partners in government, the Congress of South African Trade Unions and the South African Communist Party, as well as new Palestine Solidarity committees in Johannesburg and Cape Town.

The Palestine Solidarity groups are composed of several Muslim organizations, the Western Cape Council of Churches and Not in My Name, a Jewish group led by Water Affairs and Forestry Minister Ronnie Kasrils.

Members of the solidarity groups last week urged the government to sever all trade ties with Israel.

It seems unlikely the government will heed the calls. Earlier this month, South Africa's deputy foreign minister, Aziz Pahad, told the South African Zionist conference that the government intended to take an "even-handed" stance toward the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

The Talmud says that the town of Zippori, in the Lower Galilee northwest of Nazareth, was so named "because it is perched on the top of a mountain like a bird [zippor]."

Also perched on this picturesque mountain, roughly 1,800 years ago, was the Sanhedrin, the grand rabbinic-judicial council of ancient Israel, whose head, Rabbi Yehudah Hanasi, spent his time here redacting the Mishnah, the massive codification of Jewish oral law that is the foundation of the Talmud.

Exiled from Jerusalem in 70 A.D., the Sanhedrin moved to Yavneh for 60 years, then to Beit She'arim and other spots in the Lower Galilee before settling in Zippori (also known by the Greek name Sepphoris) about 200 CE.

"This place is of tremendous importance in Jewish history," says our guide, Mike Rogoff, as he leads us up the gentle slopes of the former city, of which only excavated ruins remain. We are surrounded by a gently rolling panorama of fields, olive groves and more distant hills and towns, including Nazareth.

One wonders what these hills might say if they could speak! The best view is from the roof of a renovated Crusader watchtower whose walls incorporate some much earlier Roman sarcophagi.

A thriving Jewish town, Zippori submitted peaceably to the Romans during the great Jewish revolt of 66 CE, roughly 130 years before the members of the Sanhedrin found refuge here.

Zippori's surrender "didn't endear them to the Jewish world – it left a big gaping hole in the defence of the Galilee," Rogoff explains. "I think that would tend to hint at the prosperity of the town. It has always been my belief that rich men make poor rebels. They've got too much to lose."

The town was depopulated of Jews and newly-populated with Roman pagans and Christians, but the Jews returned after a generation, albeit now as a minority. "These three communities lived side by side, I wouldn't say in a paradise of relations, but they managed to co-exist somehow."

On a hillside is the ruin of a moderate-sized Roman theatre that must have been the scene of many ancient games, dramas and other entertainments. Higher up, we pass through a second- or third-century residential quarter under excavation by Duke University; an ancient mikvah or ritual bath leaves no doubt that the inhabitants were Jewish.

The Talmud mentions Zippori many times and records that there were 18 synagogues here when Rabbi Yehudah Hanasi lived here. Revered as a brilliant Torah luminary, his wealth and authority within the Jewish community were recognized even by the Roman administration, which conferred on him and the rabbinical council a quasi-royal status; hence the title nasi or prince.

While numerous synagogue sites have been identified at Zippori, only one has been fully excavated. Its central hall has a mosaic floor bearing signs of the zodiac, illustrations related to Temple sacrifices, and Greek and Aramaic inscriptions.

Further up the slope, at an advantageous vantage point, we enter a building protecting Zippori's most spectacular artifact, known as the Mona Lisa of the Galilee.

The well-preserved Roman mosaic was once the floor of a Roman villa, perhaps belonging to the governor. It shows multiple colourful scenes of the life of the Greco-Roman deity Dionysus. Staring out from one outstanding panel is the face of a lady who can send art lovers and archeologists into raptures.

"Just look at the blush in the cheeks – it's almost the level of an oil painting," Rogoff says. "We don't know who she was: Was she the governor's wife? His mistress? Some deity? It's the same kind of dilemma that we had with the Mona Lisa."

We spend 40 minutes or so regarding the various colourful scenes and reading the curatorial panels about the mosaic, which is an outstanding example of Roman art. A second Zippori mosaic, from the Byzantine era, is also regarded as a masterpiece; its series of panels depicts the "birth" of the Nile.

The Mona Lisa of the Galilee

Other worthwhile sights here include a colonnaded street, an ancient reservoir and dozens of varied excavations. One could easily spend a half-day or even an entire day here.

But not us, Rogoff says, as he leads us back to the van. "You'll have to come back another time to see the rest," he says.

Nobody really minds. It is early Friday afternoon and we are headed for Jerusalem, the proverbial "navel of the world."

Label owner trades high tech for blues

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Fred Litwin used to be Intel's marketing manager in the Far East, but barely into middle age he retired, walking away from what many would consider to be an enviable career to start a blues music record label.

Litwin, a music lover with eclectic tastes who grew up listening to his older siblings' collection of folk music, was first touched by the blues in 1973, when he was 17, watching guitarist and singer Luther Allison perform in Montreal.

"I had never heard of blues before at all, but this concert just hit me over the head like a brick," he says. "At the end of the night, I knew that I had found the music I like most."

Litwin, who was born in Montreal and has a bachelor of commerce degree from Concordia University, joined Intel after LAN, a computer networking company he worked at, was sold to Intel.

He quit the company in January 2000.

"I was tired of the corporate stuff. Intel is a very hard-working company and I had had enough," he says. "I also was lucky enough to have enough money to retire."

Pondering his future, Litwin was inspired by the Canadian folk-music label Borealis. Litwin had invested in Borealis in 1996 and watched it become Canada's pre-eminent folk music label over the next four years.

"The more I thought about Borealis, the more I realized that I could do much the same for blues in Canada," he says.

In July 2000, Litwin launched NorthernBlues Music. By early this spring, the label will have released nine CDs.

Many have been praised extravagantly by critics, and many have received awards and award nominations.

Gritty electric NorthernBlues artists The Sidemen won four Canada-wide 2001 Maple Blues Awards, including recording of the year for their CD Rattlebag. Litwin himself received a Maple Blues Award as blues booster of the year. Harry Manx, who combines acoustic blues with Indian ragas, got the 2002 Canadian independent music award for blues album of the year for his NorthernBlues release Dog My Cat.

South of the border, Litwin's artist Otis Taylor has been nominated for four W.C. Handy Awards, including blues album of the year, for White African, a recording of protest blues about justice, race and class. The Sidemen got a W.C. Handy nomination in the best new artist debut category.

Nominated for awards, but can't get into stores

Litwin says he looks for original music that moves him and leans toward artists, such as Manx, who push the boundaries of the blues. One of Litwin's recent discoveries is David Jacobs-Strain, an 18-year-old cutting-edge blues guitarist whose CD Stuck On the Way will be released this May.

"He played like an old master," Litwin says of the first time he heard the young guitarist play. "It was scary how good David was."

Litwin compares the release of each new CD to giving birth, and says when he watches his artists perform live, he finds it hard to listen, since he is usually bursting with pride, particularly when audiences show their enthusiasm.

"The e-mail and letters that we get at NorthernBlues are just incredible. We are really touching people and that is a great feeling."

NorthernBlues CDs are sold in record stores and through the company's Web site, www.northernblues.com. It's difficult to get CDs into the stores, Litwin says, because more than 40,000 new CDs come out each year and a large store stocks only 9,000.

"Right now, some chains like HMV are getting more conservative and are focusing only on 'hits.' As a result, you will have trouble finding my CDs at HMV across the country, with the one exception being the Yonge Street store in Toronto," he says.

"This is very disappointing – particularly to know that my CDs are being nominated for all sorts of awards and they still can't get into stores."

NorthernBlues CDs are distributed across Canada, the United States, Europe and Australia, and Litwin is trying to get distribution in the United Kingdom and Scandinavia. In Canada, Litwin's CDs are handled by Festival Distribution, which specializes in marketing independently produced recordings.

There's a fairly good market for blues, according to Jack Schuller, Festival's president, because there is at least one blues club in every major city. But since Litwin's specialty is the blues – not pop or rap – there aren't huge amounts of money involved.

"You go into to it because you love the music and Fred loves the music," Schuller says.

He adds that besides releasing CDs, Litwin is also helping unknown artists establish their careers. "He's really put a lot into marketing them and supporting the artists, much more than most labels, even major ones."

Ryerson prof presents new essays on Wiseman

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ruth Panofsky, a Ryerson University English professor who specializes in the Canadian Jewish writer Adele Wiseman, has edited a new collection of scholarly essays that she hopes will make Wiseman's works more accessible to a new generation of readers.

Wiseman, who died 10 years ago, is best remembered for her novel The Sacrifice (1956), which won numerous literary prizes, including a Governor General's Award when its author was only 28. A second novel, Crackpot, was published to great critical acclaim in 1974. Both are steeped in Jewish content.

According to Panofsky, Wiseman was much more than a superb novelist. That's why the new collection of essays – titled Adele Wiseman: Essays on Her Works – takes a wider approach to a writing career that also included plays, essays, poetry, stories and a memoir. The collection is published in a handsome pocket volume by Guernica and costs $10.

"It's a scholarly collection, but the intent is to open up Wiseman's oeuvre to a broader consideration," Panofsky says.

Although Wiseman's books have never been out of print, she is mostly being read on campus these days, Panofsky says. "But each time I've taught her work, students love her. They really love Crackpot. It really resonates with young female readers."

The Winnipeg-born author, who later lived in Montreal and then Toronto, might be better known if scholars had greater access to her papers, Panofsky says. Considerable research restrictions apply to Wiseman's papers, which are housed in York University's Scott Library.

Panofsky, who had freer access to the papers while Wiseman was alive, previously co-edited a wonderful collection of letters, Selected Letters of Margaret Laurence and Adele Wiseman (1997), with Wiseman's full approval. Both Laurence and Wiseman lived for a time on the same street in Winnipeg and were almost lifelong friends.

The new volume of essays, which presents a range of scholars delving into diverse scholarly concerns and includes a lengthy 1990 interview with Wiseman, is bound to appeal to Wiseman devotees. Panofsky provides an introduction, an essay on Wiseman's treatment of female characters and a capsule biography and bibliography.

Panofsky says her deep interest in Wiseman was sparked partly because the author was both female and Jewish. "Of all Jewish Canadian writers of her generation, I think she left the deepest mark in terms of the Canadian Jewish landscape."

Assisted by a Canada Council grant, Panofsky's been writing a major work on Wiseman that she hopes to finish by summer's end. Its working title is The Force of Vocation: The Career of Adele Wiseman.

"It's the last piece," she comments. "It will really be a coming together of all those years of work."

Panofsky recently made a debut as a published poet with Lifeline, a book of poetry published by Guernica. The poems are "deeply personal, partly con-

Ted Schmidt, a Catholic educator who edits the independent Catholic New Times newspaper, has written and published a book in which he recounts his experiences "growing up Jewish" on Palmerston Boulevard in the Bloor-Bathurst neighbourhood of downtown Toronto.

With Shabbes Goy, Schmidt has laid down an engaging anecdotal account of his many friendships with his Jewish neighbours. Its full title – Shabbes Goy: A Catholic Boyhood on a Jewish Street in Protestant Toronto – gives perhaps the most thorough summary of its often amusing and insightful contents.

(A "Shabbes goy" is a vernacular term for a Gentile who performs tasks for Jewish neighbours, such as lighting a fire, that they are forbidden to do for themselves on the Sabbath.)

BATHURST
BLOOR
The remarkable evolution of a community of friends when Toronto was Belfast in the 40s & 50s
TED SCHMIDT

Born in Toronto in 1939, Schmidt played on the Harbord and the YMHA baseball teams as a boy, and recalled one episode dodging "stones, bottles and ugly ethnic curses" as he and his Jewish teammates ran, victorious, from the sore losers on the other team who were not Jewish.

"What's a kike, Manny?" Schmidt recalls asking his friend as they raced down Winona Avenue.

"A Jew," Manny replied. "Keep running."

Growing up in close proximity to the Coopers, Weisbarts, Analevitzes, Fruitmans and other Jewish families in the neighbourhood, Schmidt acquired an early sensitivity about the tragic fate of the Jews in Hitler's Europe.

"What had Manny G--'s nine aunts and uncles done to merit incineration at Treblinka?" he pondered at the age of 10. "What had their innocent children done? Why had Nathan G--, Manny's dad, been stripped of his whole family?"

Later, as a public school teacher in the 1960s, he made a special point of teaching the Holocaust at a time when "barely concealed anti-Semitism... still festered."

> 'Forgetfulness prolongs the exile; remembrance is the secret of redemption.'

"I never got tired of it. I believed with the Baal Shem Tov that 'Forgetfulness prolongs the exile; remembrance is the secret of redemption.' Catholics, I vowed, must deal with this issue, must confront 'the teaching of contempt' that had undoubtedly poisoned Christianity for 2,000 years."

Schmidt describes a remarkable encounter with a persistent Holocaust denier in his classroom who turned out to be the son of Ernst Zundel. Schmidt pitied him as "just a young man sadly in the grip of an obsessed father."

Eventually Zundel Sr. contacted Schmidt and "launched into a tirade about me falling under the sway of 'the Zionists' and their lies. I could barely be civil to him. All I could see were the faces of friends who lost families in the Shoah."

After being refused permission to bring his lies in the classroom, Zundel accused the teacher of being "anti-German" and had to be reminded of Schmidt's German surname.

Schmidt warmly recounts many details and episodes of the hallowed streets of his boyhood in the Bathurst and Bloor neighbourhood. He also devotes considerable attention to his Catholic upbringing and education, and the historic relations of the city's Catholics with Protestants and other groups.

Torontonians who grew up downtown in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s will find much of interest in Shabbes Goy. It makes perfect sense that the launch party was held recently at David Mirvish Books on Markham Street, one block east of Palmerston.

fessional and very spare," she says.

"I've been writing scholarly work for a long time, so the creative work came fairly late, when I was in my 30s. I started writing poetry when I started having children. The experience really moved me into writing in a different genre altogether."

Panofsky is one of a handful of poets scheduled to read at An Evening of Poetry at Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. W., on April 1 at 7:30 p.m. Copies of the book of essays on Wiseman should be available. For details, call Israel's at 416-789-1010.

You Don't Have to Be Jewish a Stern look at Jewish films

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Bill Stern was young, his father, Morris, took him to the Standard Theatre, where he saw Maurice Schwartz, Molly Picon, Jacob Ben Ami and Paul Muni in person.

He developed an obsession with Jewish theatre and then film that has led him to write a book on the subject – You Don't Have to Be Jewish: A Commentary on Selected Jewish Films.

Stern, 80, a social worker, says he expects to be "blasted" by readers who don't agree with his choice of films.

He reviews 55 films in five sections – Jews in Canadian movies, Yiddish films, Israeli films, a general category and Holocaust films.

"I expect the biggest response will come from people who don't like my selection of 11 Holocaust films. Everyone is a film critic, he says. I included Schindler's List because so many people have seen it. Another is Into the Arms of Strangers, a feature which dealt with the 10,000 young Jews who were welcomed by the British people while its government was blocking the establishment of Israel.

"I consider Triumph of the Spirit about what happened to the Greek Jews from Salonika a great film, particularly since it had a lot about women in it, and how women survived under the Holocaust. I think it's a fine film and everybody should see it. I include a list of recommended Holocaust films at the end of the section.

"One of them is Shoah which is in a class by itself, needing nine hours to see all of it."

A film about the Jewish poet A.M. Klein, Art is a Landscape, is reviewed in the Canadian section, as is The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz by Mordecai Richler and Lies My Father Told Me by Ted Allan.

"I did not know until I saw the film about Klein that he was a good friend of David Lewis, onetime leader of the CCF... They grew up together, went to university together, and both joined Zionist clubs. Lewis plays a big part and is wonderful to hear.

"I've included My Grandfather's Hotel by Karen Shopsowitz because it is about Monteith Inn [in Muskoka], and Karen is a Canadian filmmaker with a future. Maybe a lot of people will complain about this particular film being included."

He also reviews what he describes as a little-known feature, Canadian Jews of 1980, made by the Canadian Jewish Congress, which has remarkable footage on Saul Hayes, executive director of Congress for years, who was, Stern says, "a giant of Canadian Jewry."

Stern cut his teeth on Yiddish at the Standard Theatre and his father was a Yiddishist; hence the section on Yiddish films.

Stern cut his teeth on Yiddish at the Standard Theatre

"David Pinski, who wrote The Singing Blacksmith, with Moishe Oysher, was away ahead of his time in writing about social problems of the day. He wrote about a married man who fell in love with another woman who was also married. He was on a par with Sholom Aleichem and Sholem Asch."

Israeli films, at the beginning, dealt mainly with events surrounding the birth of Israel, such as Hill 24 Does Not Answer, a film Stern says he would like to see over and over again.

He says Ephraim Kishon, an Israeli filmmaker, who has produced a series of light humour films, is an expert on needling Jewish bureaucrats, and his Sallah is a classic of this vintage, starring the ever-popular Topol.

Two films, The Summer of Aviya and Under the Domim Tree, are reviewed by Stern, who says they are the autobiography of Israeli actor, Gila Almagor.

In the general film section, Stern has included Hester Street, which he says shows up at every Jewish film festival and can't be beaten as a realistic look at Jewish life in the early 1900s. He also chose Aviva Kempner's Life and Times of Hank Greenberg and Partisans of the Vilna Ghetto.

Shayna Rubinoff reads from a Hebrew exercise sheet, using skills which she can now use thanks to a cochlear implant. The outer part of the apparatus can be seen in her hair.

Group seeks services for hearing impaired day-school students

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Members of a new organization called Haazinu say they will lobby for funding to integrate children with hearing impairments into regular Jewish day schools.

About 15 founding members met recently with The CJN to say they won't let their children with hearing impairments flounder in Jewish day schools, nor will they transfer them to the public system, which provides services and equipment for them at no extra cost to parents.

"There is nothing wrong with public schools for those who belong there. Our kids don't," said Yisroel Janowski.

"Their soul will be lacking, because their Judaism is lacking, and the home can't compensate. The schools have an obligation to our children – they must not be disenfranchised."

The Haazinu parents said that although the province has pledged funds (through the Ministry of Health) to help children with special needs in private schools – including money for physiotherapy, nursing assistance and speech therapy – it has not designated anything for hearing impaired students.

And, the parents said, neither has UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

The development of the cochlear implant – a prosthetic replacement for the inner ear that allows for a degree of hearing by electronically stimulating the nerve that facilitates hearing – enables many children with hearing impairments to attend regular schools.

But accommodating them requires expensive adjustments to the classroom, as well as extra teacher training.

While some day-school parents fund the modifications themselves, most cannot do so and often end up transferring their children to public schools.

Stacey Daub, a manager for Community Care Access Centres (CCAC), the provincial agency that provides special help to schools, said the funding program, which is just a year old, provides professional and personal support to children with special needs in private schools – not equipment modification.

Daub said the services the province does provide are a "substantial step."

This is only the first phase of the provision of these services, she said, adding it addresses the most immediate needs of the students. "We recognize that there are many needs which have to be looked at."

Debbie Gladstone, special education consultant for the BJE, told The CJN the board is aware of the problem, and is consulting with the CCAC as to how to get services for children with hearing impairments into Jewish schools.

For people with profound hearing loss, either from birth or due to a severe illness such as meningitis, it may be possible to surgically implant a cochlear implant in the skull behind the ear and insert tiny wires into the cochlea (inner ear). The implant is then attached to an external microphone and a speech processor that converts sound into electrical impulses.

After auditory and speech training, a recipient is able to hear and interpret medium-level – and sometimes even soft – sound, and thus develop the ability for fairly advanced speech.

To accommodate students with the implant, a teacher must wear a microphone and the child must have a receiver on their desk or attached to the implant, so that even if the teacher turns away, the child can still hear.

(The teacher must also be trained, for instance, to recognize that a child with an implant can't necessarily hear questions from other non-miked students.)

Other modifications include closed captioning on televisions, carpets to buffer extraneous sounds, an in-class educational audiologist and a lowering of background noise.

Rivkie Steier, mother of a 15-year-old hearing impaired daughter, said a day school education is a priority for many parents and they are prepared to pay for it. However, she said, "don't penalize us for health concerns."

But the difficulties with the modifications are not purely financial. Many teachers hesitate to use the microphone, considering it inconvenient and intrusive. But "they would do it if it was explained to them," said Haazinu parent Tanya Goldschmidt.

In addition to lobbying government and community organizations, the founders of Haazinu, an offshoot of a New York organization of the same name, say they also intend to support other families and raise money.

For more information, call Goldschmidt at 905-889-7452.

Rabin hockey tournament just keeps on growing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament is growing about as fast as the 12- and 13-year-olds who participate in it.

This year, the tournament expanded to 12 teams from five. Spread over two divisions, the participants included a senior division consisting of wily, grizzled veterans in grades 6, 7 and 8; and juniors, those naive, wide-eyed, peach-fuzzed youngsters in grades 3, 4, and 5.

Regardless of age, all seemed to have a really good time as organizers prepared a day-long hockey festival that featured on-ice competition, musical entertainment (provided free of charge by Mandell Entertainment), food aplenty and a trophy for all participants.

Event organizer Andrea Nathanson said the tournament was an excellent opportunity to bring together Jewish youngsters from a variety of Toronto day schools. The kids look forward to it all winter long, she said.

Nathanson, whose son, Jesse, attends Associated's Kamin branch in Thornhill, and Wendy Himmel, pulled the event together along with a committee of parents from all the schools.

This tournament has proven so popular that several schools iced two teams. United Synagogue Day School (USDS) Bayview, USDS Richmond Hill, Bialik and Leo Baeck all iced junior and senior teams. USDS Bathurst, Associated Kamin and Associated Posluns (Neptune) each entered junior teams while Associated Leslie entered a senior squad. Altogether, 81 senior and 114 junior skaters participated, Nathanson said.

The blue-clad boys from Bialik finished second in senior competition.

In the junior competition, Associated Kamin defeated USDS Bayview 7-2 in the title game while in the senior championship, Associated Leslie beat Bialik 5-2.

The tournament is proving so popular, Nathanson has already fielded inquiries from other schools interested in participating next year.

Hapoel's European dream ends in defeat by AC Milan

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hapoel Tel Aviv's remarkable UEFA Cup adventure came to an end last week when they were beaten 2-0 by AC Milan to lose the quarter-final contest 2-1 on aggregate.

After Rui Costa had put Milan ahead on the night with a fifth minute free-kick, the decisive goal came on the stroke of halftime when Hapoel captain Shimon Gershon headed a Rui Costa cross into his own net.

It was a bitter way for the cup run to end for Gershon, who had led Hapoel to memorable wins over Chelsea, Lokomotiv Moscow and Parma as they became the first Israeli side to reach the last eight of the competition.

They beat Milan, five-times European champions, 1-0 in the first leg of the competition a week before, in a match that was moved from Israel to Cyprus because of security concerns. Milan had to win its home game, played at San Siro, by two goals to eliminate Hapoel.

But while Hapoel showed the spirit, determination and organization that has been the key to their outstanding European campaign, they were beaten on the night by a Milan side that finally showed signs of finding their form in an otherwise dismal season.

Milan had advanced to the final eights with a victory on penalties over Dutch side Roda JC Kerkrade, but it took the home side only five minutes for Portuguese playmaker Rui Costa to open the scoring against Hapoel with a low free-kick from 20 metres.

Hapoel responded positively and four minutes later Milan Osterc came close to getting the equalizer with a header that flashed just wide of goalkeeper Christian Abbiati's right-hand post.

But on the stroke of halftime Milan gained the overall lead when Rui Costa crossed from the right towards a hovering Filippo Inzaghi and Gershon looked to intercept, but his diving header flew into the net.

Such a blow might have weakened the will of a more frail side, but Hapoel continued to take up the fight in the second half. Hapoel gave Milan a reminder the contest was still wide-open when Osterc forced a superb diving save out of Abbiati with a glancing header from a Yossis Abuksis free-kick.

Late in the game, Milan coach Carlo Ancelotti replaced striker Simone with midfielder Massimo Donati as he sought to tighten up ahead of a late rally from Hapoel.

But the last stand never came. Around 8,000 Hapoel fans made the journey to Milan, making most of the noise in the crowd of 23,184. Their applause at the end of the game offered a reminder that despite the defeat, Hapoel had made history with their inspiring run to the last eight.

Israeli duo wins ice dance bronze

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Figure skating pair Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky made history last week when they became the first Israeli duo to win a World Figure Skating Championship medal.

The two, who finished in sixth place at the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, finished the competition in Nagano, Japan in third place, winning the bronze medal.

Chait and Sakhnovsky, who entered the first day of competition ranked seventh, had a near perfect performance in the original dance category. The two, who skated to the songs "Hava Nagila," "Yiddishe Mama," and "Heveinu Shalom Aleichem," earned high marks, which pushed them into third place, ahead of a pair of skaters from Lithuania.

The gold medal was won by Russian pair Irina Lobacheva and Ilia Averbukh. Shae-Lynn Bourne and Victor Kraatz of Canada came in second.

The Jewish world suffers

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The Jewish world is suffering. The anguish is evident, illuminating itself by the grave of yet another Jew murdered in Israel, and through the empty, disbelieving stare at a headline by a Jew travelling to work on the subway.

Jewish angst has found a home within the overworked hearts of the right and the left. It is displayed in the batei midrash of shuls, in corporate boardrooms, in school hallways – wherever Jews congregate. Deep sighs, krechts (Yiddish for a curdling moan), of sorrow exit the lips of a housewife on Bathurst Street, knowing the ache felt by her maternal counterpart in Haifa. The Torah says a parent's sins are expunged upon the death of their child.

The intifadah, the war on Israel – you choose your words – has pried open a portal that leads back along the spiraling line of persecution, pogroms and mass destruction perpetrated against Jews for millennia. A friend told me he believes our enemies, given the chance, would destroy Israel. Imagine the heaviness, the agony my pal carries with him. "The voice of your brother's blood cries out to me from the ground."(Genesis 4:10)

We know the feeling of being singled out as the world's only racist state, and the reality of standing first in the resolution line at the United Nations, and of witnessing the burgeoning anti-Semitism in France. It sickens us and baffles us that any massacre, famine or war on our planet, no matter how gross, plays second fiddle to Israel's actions. We are quite aware, as Aldous Huxley said, that "facts do not cease to exist because they are ignored."

The trauma of our history has once against reawakened, and subtly, like a quiescent and sluggish volcano, crept its way inside of us, prompting a noiseless fear and stoic incredulity. Again, Israelis and Diaspora Jews sit awkwardly among the nations of the world like a little girl among her new classmates for the very first time: Scared, lonesome and perplexed.

It's okay to be scared. I am. It's natural to be disappointed. It makes sense to cry out, "Oy, when will it all stop?" You can see the Jewish sorrow in my eyes, and I can see it in yours.

Pesach has arrived and we will drape ourselves in a flowing white kittel and sit majestically at our table, telling the story of our departure from slavery and the resilience of the indomitable Jewish spirit. We'll lean to the left in our chairs, slouched in the puffiness of our pillows, remembering that we were once slaves – but no longer. We are free!

This year, in 5762, perhaps we should lean with more vigour and commitment. Maybe we should settle into our place at the Passover seder with pride and unbridled optimism for our future. We should pray with passion for a time when Israelis and Jews are called upon to export our expertise in agriculture rather than our knowledge of early warning systems, and when we bid to import the great Egyptian books of poetry and the silky linens and spices of our current enemies.

This year, when we read the Haggadah and say, "Those who are hungry, let them come and eat," know that in some ways we are praying for ourselves. The hunger is ours. It is a hunger for peace of mind, safety and unity among all nations. When we say, "Next year in Jerusalem," consider that Jerusalem is a metaphor for harmony and holiness and that deep within the crevices of humankind lies our capacity to arrive at those very lofty places.

Leonardo da Vinci said, "Shadows can be infinitely obscure or display an infinity of nuances in the light tones." This year, on Pesach, let Jews everywhere find beauty and the colour of hope among the shadows of war that temporarily hover ominously over our heads.

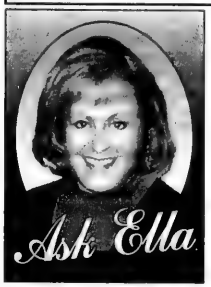
About Life



Dear Ella,

I belong to a very large family, and for the first seder each year, we all try to have it together. The only home large enough to have all of us is my aunt's. There are usually 42 people. We meet in advance to decide who will make what dish and we fill in whatever else we need by using a caterer.

As for set-up and cleanup, we get a couple of waitresses in to help with that. We split the cost of the extra food and the help equally.

Here is what bothers me. When it is over, all the leftovers remain at my aunt's house. She distributes some to her daughters and daughter-in-law, but never offers any leftovers to the rest of us.

The way I see it, we all make something and we all pay for the seder equally. Shouldn't we all share in the leftovers equally? I know it would save me a lot of extra cooking for the holidays.

Pass the Leftovers

Dear Pass the Leftovers

You are very fortunate to have such a large family that can all share in a Passover seder together. It must be a very special time for all of you, especially the kids.

As for the problem you have presented, I'm sure it is annoying, especially since it seems you have let it fester for awhile, but there is a solution. How about discussing this in advance at your pre-Passover meeting. When you all get together to discuss who will make what and how much money you each owe, why not suggest sharing in the leftovers too? I'm sure the rest of the crowd would like it, and very possibly your aunt hasn't even thought about it. The fact that she offers to host such a huge seder every year is quite an undertaking that should not be taken for granted.

After your aunt has put away whatever she wants, as she deserves first dibs, maybe the rest of you could bring your own containers so she wouldn't have any added work, and just have a free-for-all for the rest of the food.

The main thing is not to lose touch of the reason you are all together and enjoying the holidays – family.

SIXTH ANNUAL PASSOVER LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

To our readers

We at The CJN are delighted once again to publish our annual Passover Literary Supplement. As always, we received many more worthy submissions than we were able to accommodate on our pages. We are deeply grateful to all the writers who sent their works to us. We understand the disappointment of submitting and not seeing one's work published and we hope that disappointment will not deter our readers from submitting new works in the future.

This year, we have included an essay by the renowned Canadian author and humourist, Allan Gould, who speculates on the books that might appear in a private Jewish library.

We hope our readers enjoy the supplement and find in it some tidbits of literary pleasures to match the many familial and spiritual pleasures of the holiday. Chag Sameach.

Ha lachma anya

Punctuating the poetry and prose of this supplement are archival and current photographs by Dan Carmi of the Ethiopian aliyah to Israel. Though the photos are remarkable works of art in their own right, we publish them more to highlight the poignancy of the social and economic challenges Israel now faces in the midst of the violence into which it has been thrust by the Palestinian Authority. Some 85,000 Ethiopian Jews live in Israel, fully 23,000 of whom were born there. As a community, they are paying the heaviest price of the high rate of unemployment currently gripping Israel.

Ha lachma anya, the bread of poverty and hard times, which we recall each Pesach, is not only a metaphor at the seder table. It is also a difficult reality for many people today struggling to cope with many levels of anxiety and uncertainty. Let us bear that reality in mind when we all point to the matzah this year on Pesach.

Faces

Mother examines my face at angles her head cocked to the right. She says You're the image of my sister Rivkah.
then turns away, picks up the dishtowel.
Her neighbour from the Old Country studies me hard, says Just like your Sarah.
Mother nods, father snarls Impossible!
She's like a twin to my Golda.
And so it goes over my years, the shadows of my aunts playing across my changing face.

Hollow Prayers

Every Saturday he goes to synagogue.
He arrives early, takes his usual seat, passes the morning chanting psalms, making small talk with the regulars.
Halfway through he retires with his brother to the basement for a L'Chaim with the schnapps and herring club.

Every now and then, when the rabbi's sermon preaches divine goodness and love,
Dad shakes his head and his face sours.
So where was this kind God in Auschwitz?
Silence hangs from the sanctuary dome like tears blackened with ash.

First Friends

On the third afternoon they come, three aged boys
dad's pals from the Old Country.
They warm with volleys of banter, study ceiling lights, turn dreamy.

We were neighbours of your father in Kielce.
Handsome guys – girls liked us,
let us sneak a kiss.
Winters, we sailed across the ice, triangles of wood sharp with metal strips tied to our shoes.
Summers, we played street-soccer, kicked a ball of suit scraps begged from your zaidie's tailor shop.

We thought those days would keep growing.
The Nazis cut them into the dirt.

Isaac the baker

By ANDREW FAINER

Isaac the Baker's van turned the corner and stopped at the first house on the street at 8:05 a.m., just like it did every day Monday to Friday. I waited. I knew the routine. The routine ended with a small cellophane-wrapped chocolate cake. But think of the coldest day you can remember, add a bone-cutting wind and grainy snow stacked up on the streets like bricks, and you'd know, unless you were 10 years old like I was, it could only be routine if you're the one waiting inside a warm house, not if you're the one in the van.

But first let me describe what usually happened. Isaac's first stop on the street was at the family that used to do their own gardening – something unique in the middle-class Jewish neighbourhood. The mother's complexion was porcelain smooth.

The second stop was at the home of the father and son who walked past our house every Saturday morning on their way to shul. The father limped badly but smiled broadly. One of his daughters, who was particularly pretty with delicate features and soft-looking blonde hair that held a natural curl, was usually picked up in a snazzy little sports car.

The third house was where the mother chewed gum almost all the time, and one of their sons attended a special school – the same son who often found his own way to our house to play with our dog, eat cookies and lie himself down for a nap with my father. The van stopped there only every other day, just like at the next door where the children were grown. All of them, even the child who was blind, had scored among the highest on province-wide high school matriculation exams (a list of the top grade-getters appeared in both the Star and the Gazette).

The last house belonged to an elderly couple whose grandchildren came for supper every Friday night. By 8:20, the van would stop in front of our house and I'd call to my mother, "Isaac the Baker is here."

Isaac, short and middle-aged, with dark eyes and skin made leathery by countless trips from van to house, climbed the steps and rang the doorbell. Mom told me what she needed (either rye, white-sliced or challah) and I told him. He descended the stairs, opened the back door to the van and returned back up the stairs. He handed me the bread and cakes, and told me how much it would cost.

She reached into her bra and withdrew a couple of scrunched-up bills

I went to the kitchen where Mom sat in a bathrobe with coffee, cigarettes and a crossword puzzle in front of her. She reached into her bra and withdrew a couple of scrunched-up bills. I returned to the door. Isaac took the money and then reached deep into his pockets. With thick fingers, he rolled bills off a wad and then fished out coins from a handful of change. Meanwhile Dad was upstairs, showered and shaved, putting on a well-tailored suit purchased from an uncle in the business. My older sister, on the diet-of-the-day, had little interest in bread or pastry, and was upstairs putting on her makeup. A suitor in a powder blue Camaro would pick her up later.

I gave the change to Mom. Then I ate my little cake with due appreciation and method (remove the cake from the cellophane, chip off the chocolate, separate the two layers, eat the cream centre, then the two vanilla-cake layers, and only then the thin layer of chocolate I removed in the beginning).

Anyway, that was the routine. Just let me add that Isaac was polite, but he wasted few words. He had a lot more business to do, even though mine was done.

Isaac was one of only three adults I knew that I could refer to by their first names. The other two were Lina (a French-Canadian maid) and Jack, who repaired bicycles. Jack and Isaac both did roll-up-your-sleeves work and both spoke with eastern European accents.

Isaac was, of course, a "survivor," but 30-odd years ago, it was not something us kids of Canadian-born parents knew about. Tell me Isaac was a "survivor" and I might have thought it had something to do with his work in his van and the winter.

Even so, the "routine" existed because whatever the weather, Isaac always made his appointed rounds. The only change was in the layers of garments he wore. Although a "baker," a deliverer of baked goods, he wore a suit because all men wore suits back then. During the winter he'd wear layers of suit jackets. On a particularly cold day, he'd wear a sweater vest under the jackets. He'd also wear a cap, one that barely covered the ears. I never saw him wearing gloves. His fingers were red and wet when he'd fish for change or roll bills off the wad. Sometimes he'd guess at what we'd want in order to save himself a trip up and down the stairs, but there was no hint of complaint if he'd still have to make a second trip.

That was it, starting from 8:05 at the top of the street to our front door at 8:20. But on this one winter day from hell, I looked out the door at 8:20 and saw Isaac still halfway down the block. He was hunched over an exposed engine, half-covered in snow. At 8:40 the doorbell rang. The van was still halfway down the block, but Isaac was there with a bread and a snack cake in hand. His eyebrows were covered in ice. It was like the pictures you see of someone climbing Mount Everest, but without the fancy clothing or equipment. He stood there just inside our front door. He was too cold to speak.

I suspected it was this silence that impelled Mom to come to the door, her bathrobe cinched tight. She invited him to come in for a few minutes to get warm. He declined. Mom insisted, pointing out that there was little further he could go without his van working. He sat mute at the kitchen table. Mom got dressed quickly and joined him. I went downstairs with my cake to watch TV.

When I came back up, just a few minutes later, though his jackets were still on, his collar was open, the colour was returning to his face and he was warming his hands around a coffee mug. I left for school.

He talked to my mother. There's no simple way for a son to describe his mother, but Mom's understanding way opened up the heart of anyone who talked to her. She was also at the time a beauty of the young-Judy Garland type. At any rate, they had time to talk. The garage couldn't send their tow truck until mid-morning.

That evening around the dinner table Mom told us his story. Isaac came to Canada after the war. A few years later he married a woman who also had been through the war. He worked hard, starting in the early morning hours picking up at the bakery, and peddling his wares until late in the afternoon. His wife worried that he worked too hard for his own good. For years she tried to convince him to find something recreational to participate in. He finally joined a bowling league. He had fun. Then one evening just a few years back he returned home from bowling to find his wife dead from a heart attack. Isaac was left alone to raise their son, who was about my age.

There's no simple way for a son to describe his mother...

I just couldn't imagine anything sadder than that.

By the next day the streets had been cleared, the van repaired (he was soon to get a new one) and I had my cake by 8:20. But the routine had changed. There were many mornings afterward, until my parents moved more than a decade later, that Mom came to the door herself. Even when she didn't, Isaac's accented voice was warmer. It must make a difference to have a door to knock on in the cold.

Best wishes for a Happy Passover to all our friends and customers

DANIER LEATHER touch

Prayer Prayer Prayer Prayer

by Susan Petersiel Berg

I. Untitled
In the beginning (OK, maybe not the very beginning) there was the sacrifice.
If you are reading chronologically, it is closer to the middle.
But it was the beginning of ritual.
And it was good.
Some would say it was great.
It was spectacle and theatre.
It was physical and spiritual.
With all the senses
it brought humans closer to God.
And when it ended
It left a hole
And we filled that hole with prayer, with talk of greatness.
Still, there were gaps.
Ever after,
we have struggled to fill them.

II. God Speaks
Shed the blood of my child and I will curse you and the children who come after you.

Shed the blood of my animal and present it to me as though it were your own and you will shed your sin.

Blood is life and blessing.
Blood is death and curse.
Only I can set the boundary.

III. Sacrifice
Day breaks over Jerusalem.
Sunlight seeps through the cracks in the walls of the Temple.
Soon the slap of sandals on stone braying of goats snorting of bulls fill the air.
One by one the people approach the priest deliver the chosen animal and watch as blood is drawn,
dashed at the altar.
Human heart soaring as the burnt offering rises to reach God in smoke and scent.
Human sin is washed away.

IV. Destruction, Part 2
The walls come tumbling down.
The Temple is no more,
its stones scattered the scent of sacrifice dissipating on the wind.
Nothing left but ritual crouching in memory's corners
remnants, and words
remnants, and words.
The new heartbeat of a people.

V. Kavannah/Intention
Thin square sliver of soap.
I focus my mind
on each section of my body cleaning each, then moving on to the next stopping to be sure the soap is gone ears to neck to chest arms and belly and legs between the toes.
I run my fingers through my hair and collect the rough strands that gather there open my hand to the shower of water and watch the strands wash away.

VI. Mikvah/Ritual Bath
After the shower
I remove my towel
Step naked and clean down the tiled stairs.
I do not even realize that the water has risen to meet me and I am in it.
Unseeing
but hearing the echo of song then immersing
so that I float like a baby in its mother's womb rising to the rhythm of prayer to the taste of salt.

VII. Tallit/Prayer Shawl

My prayer shawl is a tree of life stretching back through grandmothers.
Its blues and greens and purples are the flow of the life-giving waters, and blood through which my daughter/her mother/my mother/her mother have travelled to bring me to this place.
God will give strength to all people.
God will bless all people with peace.

I watched.
And I listened.
He spoke softly, clearly, and with little emotion.
I had heard the same words before.
I could repeat them: detail-by-detail.
The surgeon changeth, but the procedure remains the same, I thought to myself.
He left.
I debated: do I talk? do I keep silent?
I saw her tears.
I remembered my own.
I looked at her fear.
I recalled feeling the same way.
The operation is not painful, I blurted out.
It is the recovery that's the killer.
You never get used to the tubes, to the constant probing of your body.
You've been there, she asked.
Yes, I replied.
How long?
Five years, I answered.
It came back, she said gently.
Yes.
I am so sorry, she added with warmth.
And with sincerity she inquired,
What will they do?
I don't know, I said.
They will try their best. Who knows?
I am hoping for a long, painless time in the palliative centre.
We all know that it will come back.
We pray that we live a lifetime before it returns.
You must get a good night's sleep.
You must be strong.
So dream the most pleasant of dreams.
Dream of hugging your children for the first time.
Of making love with your husband.
Of dancing at your wedding.
Of skipping rope with your whole heart as a little girl.
Dream of beautiful sunrises and sunsets.
Of pristine mountains and lakes.
Of soothing oceans and beaches.
Pleasant dreams.
Be strong.
May the Lord be with you.

Masha's Bear

By RONALD RUSKIN

When I was a child, I never wanted to sleep.

Sleep stole you from the world. Sleep closed your eyes and shut wonder away. If my eyes were heavy, I fought sleep as if it were the enemy. I struggled to stretch my waking days from morning to afternoon, from twilight to night.

In the Torah, it is written, life's creation began in darkness. It was not darkness, but the void I feared.

Light from the outside world came from a small window. My mother closed the curtains and turned off my light. My bedroom grew dark and silent. She kissed me goodnight.

"Close your eyes, Reuben. Go to the sleepy-time show."

"Please, leave the door open."

"Remember, the sleepy-time show, Reuben. Everything will be fine."

I learned to listen to silence and see the dark.

If I fell asleep for too long I worried that a big dream would trap me and I would never return to the world.

Mornings, after my parents left for work in the drugstore below, Bubba told me to wash and dress.

"Nu, Reuben. Hurry up. Vos macht du in the bathroom?"

"I'm combing my hair."

"Please, a movie star? Your hair will fall out."

Frightened, I checked my scalp, then ran to the kitchen and sat down with a magazine from the drugstore. While the steaming oatmeal cooled, I looked at pictures.

"You can't read Reuben."

"Pictures, I read fine, Bubba."

After breakfast, Bubba, stooped from arthritis, schlepped me from where we lived on top of my father's drugstore to school seven blocks away. In those days, unless you were royalty, you walked. Bubba was a world traveller. She journeyed from Niagara Falls to Richmond Hill, peddling clothes door to door. With her back bent, she out-walked me.

"Be smart, Reuben." Bubba kissed me. "Read."

For the next four hours, we sat in a big room with long windows and blackboards. Kindergarten. Half-day classes.

Drawing, cutting, alphabet, singing, listening – that's what we did. Our teacher, Mrs. Kohl, yelled, "Lean forward. Fold your hands on your desks. Lower your hands. Close your eyes."

I was afraid to fall asleep. What could I do?

I leaned forward, closed my eyes and feigned sleep. Through the spines of my eyelashes, I saw light. I heard bodies shuffle. I smelled paper, glue, waxed oak floors and the familiar scent of my wood desk.

Then, against my will, I fell asleep.

Later, Mrs. Kohl yelled and slapped her desk with a pointer. What noise! We jumped out of our dreams. How long had we been asleep? Who knew to read a clock?

One student was sleepy all the time.

Her name was Masha. She had rings around her eyes and a frown on her beautiful face. She had come to school in October and had no friends, only a bear that she took to class. I wanted to talk to her but she was too pretty.

When I looked her way, I blushed.

My mother picked me up from class and we walked home.

"Nu, Reuben. How was school?"

"Fine."

"You learned something?"

"Numbers. Letters. Then we slept."

"Good. Soon, you will read."

After lunch, I wanted to play outside but my mother led me to my bedroom. "Time for shluffy, Reuben."

"Where's Bubba?"

"Working. Downtown."

Passover Greetings

"Everybody works. Why do I sleep?"

"To give your neshume a rest."

"What is a neshume?"

"It is what you were before you had a shadow," my mother said, "before you had a body."

"Show me a neshume."

My mother sighed like Bubba. "It is the deepest part of you. One day you'll understand, Reuben."

"If I fall asleep for too long, will I wake up?"

"Of course, Reuben." She tucked me in bed. "I have to work. A long sleep is good for you."

My mother waited a few minutes. I pretended to sleep. I heard footsteps descend the stairs to my father's drugstore.

Then I was alone.

I rose and looked at Masha's small white house across the road. I looked at the farmers' fields that surrounded our drugstore. Snow fell in November and the countryside became endless white. Wind whistled through the apartment. Sleepless, I wondered what Masha did each afternoon. To amuse myself, I found magazines, staring at photos with squiggles. In one magazine, there were burning ships, smoke, black palm trees. A weary-faced man sat in a wheelchair, a blanket over his knees.

Later I asked, "Who's he? What is burning?"

"That's Roosevelt," mother said, "Those ships burned at Pearl Harbor." My mother explained about the attack.

"Will it happen here?"

"It was years ago. It was bad for America," my mother said. "It wasn't good for Jews. At least America joined the war. Don't worry, Reuben. Everything will be fine."

In those days before reading, my world was filled with curiosity and fear. I spent late afternoons in my father's drugstore leafing through Life, Look, Star Weekly. I carried magazines to bed. The photos were black and white. My fingertips traced Roosevelt's weary face as if they felt his thoughts.

My bed was an island. My blanket was a sea where imagination played. The shore was my pillow. Not knowing words brought dreams and fears closer. Sleep floated me, but I was afraid to drift far, and never find my way back.

I was a castaway.

Masha's mother bought medicine in my father's drugstore. Sunday, before my nap, I asked Bubba questions.

"Bubba, what's wrong with Masha's father?"

"Pills, he needs. Ich vais?"

"Why?"

"Ask your father."

"Bubba, you know everything."

"Tattele, for you, maybe," Bubba smiled. "Your father studied drugs at university."

"Masha's father, is he sick?"

"Yes."

"Will you get sick?"

Bubba frowned. "Don't give me an ahora."

"Will I get sick?"

"Reuben. Downstairs your father has a store full of drugs. Feter Herschel and Morris, Cousin Saul and Arnold are all doctors."

I pictured bottles of strong medicine in my father's dispensary; I saw my father, my uncles and cousins shoulder to shoulder in white coats, like soldiers, waiting.

That afternoon, after Bubba tucked me in, I stopped worrying about closing my eyes, drifting and not finding a way back.

I was sure that I would never die.

Masha's mother had thin blonde hair, blue eyes and always smiled in my father's drugstore. She worked as a nurse and each week bought pills for her husband. She was so pretty and happy that everyone liked her. Since we were neighbours, she invited me to visit Masha.

"Reuben, will you have lunch with us tomorrow?'

"I better ask my mother."

"She agreed, if you want," her mother said. "We are new here. Masha has no friends."

Her mother spoke differently from the others.

Next morning, Masha's mother came to the drugstore and walked us through the December snow to class. On the way, we saw a grey squirrel lying very still on the road. I was too excited to sleep, but Masha, as usual, slept with her bear for half the morning.

Her mother walked us back to their house after school, set peanut butter sandwiches on the kitchen table, poured us milk and excused herself when there was a knock at the door.

"That's the new doctor," Masha whispered. "Be quiet."

We ate lunch in silence.

"Where's your father?"

"Upstairs. Listen."

There was the sound of laboured breathing, coughing.

"Why does he make that noise?"

"The doctor gives him a needle at lunch." Masha's dark eyes brightened. "Come."

Without thinking, I followed her.

The bedroom door was ajar, the doctor bent over her father, jabbing a needle into his chest – or was it his stomach? Who remembers? All I know was that the biggest needle I had ever seen sucked out yellow liquid. His body, his face, his eyes, were yellow.

"Mom says he's better after the needle," Masha's dark eyes sharpened. "Did she tell you I had no friends?"

"Yes."

"But I do have friends."

The doctor left after that and Masha's mother smiled and introduced me to her husband. He sat very still at the end of his room in a wheelchair with a blanket over his lap. He looked tired like President Roosevelt except he was yellow.

"I'm fine, son," he said. "Don't mind the colour."

I tried to keep from staring. I looked at wrinkles in his bed. Then I looked at him again.

Masha led me down the hall to her room.

On her bed was her family: a bear, two dogs and four child-dolls. We lay down and she talked to them.

"They never sleep at night."

"Why?"

"Listen."

The bear's eyes shook. He made a terrible groan.

"Reuben has a store full of pills." Masha said.

The bear coughed.

"Reuben will get you pills."

We became friends and met her family often after lunch. We told them that the bear would get better, so the rest of the family would be able to sleep.

We told them that everything would be fine.

As it were the very heaven for clearness
Exodus 24:10

I.
Looking up,
looking for the road in heaven that God travels, sapphire-like, his breeze kissing the face of the waters.
I struggle squinting into the blues cannot distinguish among the myriad hues but for a long time
my people have said:

It is there

so I keep looking.

II.
And God said: Come up to me to the mountain, and be there.

III.
And God showed all things in one last breath on the last mountain top from which he never again came down.
Moses. He had a promise to be he-who-he-was and pass on his wise breath.
And Joshua he trusted and touched so that he, Joshua, could also be carried by that same sage wind.

The Passover Dove

By HARRY RAJCHGOT

Passover was coming. It was the first Passover that Froim and his wife Esther would celebrate since before the war, which had ended two years earlier. Observance was now at last permitted. Esther still had no idea where they would find the ritual items needed to celebrate the festival of freedom. They owned only the clothes on their backs. They resided in a refugee camp.

Froim remembered the details of the Passover story he had heard recited so many times when he was a child in prewar Poland. It had told of the escape from Egypt, but for him, his own escape gave it a particular reality. Froim had fled to Russia and there he had spent the war years. What had followed was inconceivable.

The German machine had taken his entire family, his parents, three sisters and two brothers. He had tried to convince them to follow him but they didn't. Running away had seemed to them such a radical and risky move. They had children and property to think of. How could they leave? They stayed and they died. In the end, he was the only one among them to survive. The war rolled after him, but the Germans were unable to defeat Russia, and then, finally, the terrible war was over. The Nazis, who had taken Poland in the first weeks of September 1939, had been defeated by the combined efforts of millions of citizens of a multitude of lands.

Esther, Froim's wife, had by luck, foresight, or the grace of God also escaped to Russia with her older sister. It was in Russia that she and Froim had met, and some months after the war ended, they married. They then returned to Poland, but the world they remembered was gone. No one remained. Their humble properties had been confiscated by the local population or destroyed. There were threats. They had to keep moving, and eventually reached the refugee camp at Pocking in southern Germany, in the American zone of occupation. When they arrived, Esther was already pregnant with their first child.

The couple waited for their chance to move where they could lead a better life. It was almost Passover of 1948. Esther ached to return to her traditions and somehow reclaim them in this altered landscape. Froim was bitter, angry with God for his loss. Ritual repelled him. Their son Hershele had been born in the camp and was now almost 18 months old. The birth gave them a desperate feeling of renewal. The trauma of the past, dreadful and powerful, sat brooding on their shoulders like a hungry raven.

'There was no shochet'

Esther could not on her own have found the ritual items needed to prepare this first seder. Her son's needs came first; she could not wander. Some would be provided by the Joint Committee and the American Red Cross. She had received a box of matzahs baked in America and a bottle of kosher wine that they would share with other families. For the Passover plate, she would still need greens, apples and nuts, and bitter herbs for the karpas, charoset and maror. Saltwater was an easy thing to prepare, but even for this, she needed salt. She pleaded with Froim to help her find these. There were other items needed, a shankbone and an egg, but Esther did not expect to have them in these difficult times.

"We will celebrate Passover, Froim. We have lost so much. We must rebuild our lives. We have a son. I want him to learn our traditions."

Froim wanted only to blank out his past. He tried to resist, but he, like his wife, needed the comfort of the familiar. He felt himself tugged in Esther's direction. His love for her brought him around.

Froim scouted the marketplace of the town nearby, where he found most of the basics he needed. He roamed farther, and came across a small farm. The farmer's wife was part-Jewish although she had not been classified as a Jew during the Nazi years. Out of pity, she let him take four eggs and a live dove.

Froim had spent almost the whole day on his quest, and was tired when he got back to the camp. As he brought the bird into the barracks, his son yelled out excitedly, "Feigele! Feigele!" Froim nervously showed the bird to his wife, discomfited at his son's reaction. The boy would soon be eating the bird that now so delighted him.

Esther called to Hershele and gave him a hug, trying to divert his attention. Esther was also pleased. She was happy that her husband had been so successful in his quest. Esther could roast one egg for the Passover plate. There only remained one item, a leg bone, which represented the Paschal lamb offering and also the strong hand of God, who had brought the children of Israel out of Egypt. It would come from the dove.

There was no shochet in the camp, though. Foim, although squeamish, told Esther that he would kill the bird. She was torn between one tradition and the other. How could she prepare a bird for the Passover table that had not been slaughtered in a kosher fashion? Froim insisted that they had no choice, and that in such a circumstance, he would be permitted to carry out the act. The meat would be permissible, he said. God had looked away when their families were slaughtered, he added bitterly. Perhaps he could continue to do so for a little while longer. Esther was dismayed but accepted his interpretation. She prayed that God really would look away.

Froim steeled himself and took the dove out to the back of the barracks. He had brought a knife. He had never done this sort of thing before. He was nervous. He gripped the small bird forcefully in one hand, the knife in the other, holding the creature against a stump of wood.

In the frantic eyes of the small, struggling head, he saw those of his brothers and sisters. He remembered the thunderous story from the Torah of the near-sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham. He shuddered but was determined that for the sake of his family, he would continue. Froim placed the knife near the dove's throat, ready, and looked away. He didn't have the stomach to watch the creature die.

"Feigele! Feigele!" yelled Hershele, running around the corner and startling Froim. The man lost his grip on the struggling bird, and, suddenly free, it flew away into the blue sky. Froim's son waved at the bird, singing it goodbye. Froim started down at his son and then up at the dove winging away. He shook his head and then, surprising himself, he smiled.

When the seder started the following night, Froim held up the large tin plate that an American Jewish soldier had managed to borrow for them from the army canteen next to the camp. On it rested the necessary symbolic foods, minus the shankbone.

Froim started: "We remember when we were slaves in Egypt, and how the strong hand of God brought us out to freedom..."

Hershele waved his own little arm in the air and smiled with the joy of a child.

Only months later, Froim and his family would be on their way to a new life in Canada. In themselves, they would find the strength to rebuild their lives. Peace would bring opportunity, and eventually a measure of prosperity. There would follow many Passovers, with full plates and freedoms. Somehow, though, the incomplete plate of their son's first real Passover had provided for them much of what they would need to know and remember.

Jerusalem Bound

by Avrohom F. Bloomstone

As her crimson sunset beset by graying cloud is stained so our joy-felt song by melancholy strains is pained
Our nightingale's sweet melody can neither surge nor rise her plaintive cry can only fly in tune with saddened theme

Until our Jerusalem sings out again until King David's harp again plays out his midnight waking song
our phoenix sleeps awaiting the final clarion call which for centuries
she has longed and dreamed...

A Woman of Valour

by Daniella English

She is sensual and loving,
Radiating sunshine on all.
A woman of true strength is she,
Sending her children to war.
Both beautiful and strong,
Courageous and brave.
Her days are young,
But her soul; aged.
She is opinionated and persistent,
Soft and romantic.
Petite in size,
Massive in love.

Mothers, fathers, brothers and sister has she lost,
Yet her head remains high.
She lives in an oasis of truth,
Amongst a sea of fallacy.
She hears bombs,
But listens to music.
She feels pain,
But emanates hope.
She smells gunfire,
But is scented with lilies.
She sees war,
But gazes at sunsets.
She is Israel.

Passover Greetings

Baba's Tablecloth

by Ricki Lerner

Baba's special holiday tablecloth covering our Seder table tonight is a crisp white memory of my grandmother.
It is a family heirloom, brought all the way from the Old Country with the burnished candlesticks and the family recipes for all of tonight's delicious delights:
mouth watering gefilte fish,
chicken soup with kneidlach, roast chicken, potato kugel, and scrumptious desserts.

Tonight we gather together with our family, our friends, and even strangers –
for no Jew should be alone tonight – to tell the story of our escape from slavery in Egypt to freedom in the Promised Land;
the story told every year in the Season of our Freedom.

I recall with fond but fading memories those who are here now only in spirit, but as I raise the first cup of wine
I can almost see Baba in her Passover dress, smiling at me,
gazing at the candles,
smelling the food, and stroking the tablecloth.

If You Believe

by Carole Glasser Langille

If you believe there are certain things one human being will not do to another or that once done, no one could deny them, go to Terezin. Go to Bergen-Belsen.

Because you were told to line up on the left, in a minute your wife, children, parents, disappear. If you don't believe one person can die again and again. Or that once dead, that's it, you're dead,
take a walk in Terezin. Take a walk in Bergen-Belsen.

Grown men weighing 80 pounds. Children thrown likes logs on the fire. Look what goes up in smoke.
If you think it's bad taste to speak of these things, breathe the air of Terezin. Breathe the air of Bergen-Belsen.

Because they took you from your home in the middle of the night.
Thousands of shoes piled and sorted. The shorn hair used to stuff mattresses. Can anyone say: I live in a civilized country?
See the sights at Terezin. Sight see at Bergen-Belsen.

How the world changes. How it goes on and on. It never happened.
It could never happen again. It could never happen here.
Spend the night in Terezin. Spend the night in Bergen-Belsen.

Oh You of Fleeting Conscience

by Donia B. Clenman

Oh you of fleeting conscience who long ago chose Mecca and Medina over Jerusalem, who crowned Ramla capital
disdaining Urusalim, who bled white the nourishing soil growing thistles and thorns in the wind making all decent men weep at the sight of this ruined land – till desert, it became a mirage a dream of unredeemed longing.

Oh you, faint hearted ones, expendable victims of your brothers who encamp and exile you, counting heads – a trump card in a cynical game.
You who dare not raise a whisper against slaughterers of moral responsibility for whom all means justify the end; who confusing victim with victor make the world unfit for habitation from Rome to Tokyo to New York to the very stars;
admirers of Hitler, Black Munichs, Black Septembers
and all the "Abus" who brandish a dagger in the night of an unhappy world.

Like the last TV screen
you rehearse the NOW forgetting everything of before:
five wars, your trumpets, our dead –
and yours, the ones who dared dream of Peace.
I look at the ghostly face of Terry Waite and fields of Iraq and Iran;
the caves of Bora Bora and mountains of Kandahar –
the poisoned harvest of hate.
Marvel at the braggadocio of your leaders – all Saints? all Blessed Ones?
All Allah's Beloved?

How you blacken the heavens with your rages and the earth with blood of innocents as if there were no other displaced peoples, no brothers, by your brothers exiled.
And the Cross strangely mute, you brandish the sword of the Crescent to empty the mellahs of Islam in all your vast Arabian Kingdoms – survivors, victims, all.

Hamas! Hezbollah! Al Qaeda! Islamic Jihad!
"The dead do not praise the Lord."
Metullah… Machanei Yehuda… Natanya…
Sbarro… Joseph's Tomb… Tel Aviv…
"Karine A"
27 children… a market… a bus junction
a coffee house… a grave… a beach…
A ship?

the muftis' battle hymn imams' holy call in our blood unstilled.

The Cross has pitied but one Jew.

Oh transient ones, between fleeting words and sounds uncomprehending of a love to endure millennia, a loyalty to consume all prayers,
a longing beyond, reason, evil –
this East, the never setting sun of our Hope.
You, who content with clichés of "Martyrdom," murder and slaughter done forgive and forget in pious platitudes of "Quarrels among brothers."

My people, human clay, are divided, and mindful of prophetic teachings we stand bowed to lament injustice – your pain and sorrow too.

Is there no primal doubt,
no "Maybe" no "Perhaps" in your vocabulary that you will settle for nothing less but Everything, the whole the complete absolute
Whole of the Whole?

I could go on and on, except
I, "Forever my brother and sister's keeper," do not draw circles around brothers and sisters.
No right or left claims me, nor Gaza nor 'Territories.'
Among victims mine is the ashen prize.

"And they shall beat their swords into plowshares…"
Dream Isaiah.
Abraham is weeping for his children.

Three Wise Men...

By RALPH GARBER

As my father said, "Why is a nice Jewish boy like you friends with three Christian clergymen, and one of them a priest?"

It isn't hard to explain, but I still don't find it it easy, either.

I can't start at the beginning because I don't know where that is.

I can tell you who I am. My name is Morty and I am 9½ years old. I live in Lachine, a small town not far from a big city. I live with my parents at one end of St. Joseph Street and it is 1934. I know that because we have been practising to write 1935, which is coming soon.

I'll start when I was walking home from school with Bruce and Nigel on Friday afternoon just before the Christmas holidays. It was getting dark very early and as I passed Holy Angels Roman Catholic Church, Father Bastien waved to me and said I had better hurry because it was almost sundown and I had to be at synagogue. I waved back and remembered that it was every Friday when I passed the church on my way home, because I had no cheder that day.

Just a block away, I came up to St. George's Church, an Anglican one where my friend Bruce's father was the minister. He was a big man with a red face and a very loud voice. He, too, shouted, or it sounded like a shout to me, to hurry home and get ready for synagogue because it was Friday.

I waved back and told Bruce I would see him at school.

... and the famous Jewish kid

"No, you won't," he said. "We're on holiday."

Nigel saw his father, Rev. Campbell, waiting for him to cross the street and before Nigel could say anything, his father motioned to me to come over to him. Reverend Campbell's church, The River United Church, was alongside Nigel's house and the minister looked at his watch and said nothing.

"I know, I know," I said; and Nigel said, "He knows, he knows."

Nigel's father laughed and told us we had to look after our young Jewish friend to make sure he didn't stray. I wasn't sure what stray meant but guessed that I was expected to go home and not play with my friends.

That was the first time all three men were around to warn me to go home. Usually it is only one, or at most two of them. But maybe because of what happened last week they were out to watch me.

Maybe that is where I am supposed to start, but never mind, I'm getting to it. You see, last week around the same time, I was walking alone and suddenly three French kids started yelling at me and calling me "maudit Juif." I ran from them and because Holy Angels Church was close, I ran up the roadway to the steps of this church and tried to open the huge door. The door swung open and I fell inside at the foot of the priest. He picked me up and saw the three boys stop and stare at me. One said, "C'est un petit Juif." The priest answered, "I know, and so was Jesus." They backed away and I heard the priest tell them to leave me alone or their parents would hear about it. I should mention this was all in French. I should also mention that I speak French too, because I play with French kids who live on my block.

The priest asked me if I was OK and if I could go home alone. I said I was, but didn't really believe it. He said he needed to go for a walk and would go with me part way.

"Do you know where I live?" I asked, and he said everyone along St. Joseph Street knew where I lived.

"You are famous," he said.

I couldn't wait to get home and tell my mom and dad, but I got cold feet when I remembered what my father thought about people who ran away and don't stand up and defend themselves. I didn't tell him then and waited for the right moment, which came exactly one week later.

When I told them, my parents, that is, what had happened with the three clergymen as I was walking home, my mom was very happy they were looking after me to make sure I was behaving. My dad looked at me strangely and said there was more to this than meets the eye. I then told him what the priest of Holy Angels had done the week before, walking me part way home.

"Why would he do that?" my dad asked.

Because he said I was famous, everybody on St. Joseph Street knew me.

"And why are you famous?" he asked.

I sure didn't know the answer to that question. I guessed that maybe it was because I was Jewish and there weren't any others on St. Joseph Street for blocks and blocks.

"That is a very good guess, and I think there is more to the story you're not telling me," my father said.

I then told them about being chased by some French kids that I didn't know, and that I had run into the church and the priest warned the kids to leave me alone. When my dad heard that Bruce and Nigel walked home with me, he asked if they usually did that.

"Not usually; maybe one of them would walk home with me or nobody would," I said.

He then wondered out loud how many times the two ministers met me and told me to get home and to synagogue.

"Not very often, I guess," I said, "but when I play in their houses they tell me."

My dad then told me I was lucky to have "three wise men" to look after me. I had just heard the Christmas story in school where they sing Christmas carols and tell stories about Jesus and the wise men who came to see Jesus.

My mom thought it was alright for them to do that, because it was a Protestant school and there were two kinds of schools in town, one Roman Catholic and the other Protestant. Oh, Mom would say, one French and one English.

My dad left me and went to the telephone and called Father Bastien. In French, he thanked him for looking after me and wondered about the other clergymen. Father Bastien told him that he had called them to let them know what happened to their sons' friend. My dad hung up and started to call Bruce's father, when my mother asked what the priest said. My dad asked her to wait until he had made the other two calls. He then told her what had happened and how the three clergymen planned to keep an eye on me and protect "their famous Jewish kid on St. Joseph Street."

My dad then asked: "Shouldn't you be famous for what you are and not who you are?"

I still can't tell the difference between the two, but my dad said I would when I grew older.

The Legend of Now

by Ruth Bernard

The Pesach of my youth in sweet chant
Papa, my first rabbi, my teacher
Offers the Ho Lachmo Anyo
In love-filled voice
Manna from my father's lips
Me of then, girl with saucer eyes
Drinks in the intrinsic kernel of the tale.
Rendered from bitter herbs and Haroseth, the mortar worked by slave
Rituals imprint and seeds take root
Awakening conscience of growing child.

No mere tale droned in ancient strains
But a spring fed by Mother's smile and Seder guests welcomed by opening prayer
Yom-Tov candles light the way
Exposing hidden corners of the heart
Where chometz lurks and lies in wait
To leaven and take over the endangered soul.
The legend sweeps me into its voice
Free yourself of every Pharaoh
Especially the one within

Living in a sealed room

By LAILA LIPETZ

How could I ever imagine that cello tape, not tuna fish, would be my favourite care package from Canada? With daily pronouncements of the imminent chemical Armageddon Israel will soon experience, my faraway family can do little more than send shipments of tape and chocolate, batteries and books, to keep us company in the rural isolation of my border kibbutz.

I wait for my children to be in bed. The news is bad enough, they don't need to watch me as well. A roll of cello tape in each hand, I walk reluctantly, heavily to my bedroom. I close the shutters, then the window, on the star-suffused country sky, not knowing when I will be able to open them again. Glancing at the book lying open on my bed, I scan for words to remind me of the tasks I have waited all day to do: sterile clothes in Mason jars… emergency food supply… prevent glass shards… cello tape windows… sealed room. The cello tape clicks and snaps as I stretch it across the window pane. I see reflected in the tape-on-glass checkerboard the bizarre pantry of clothing-filled jars, the grotesque gallery of gas masks, my drawn, determined face.

Wafting down from the end of the hall is the children's giggling, that laughter that bubbles up from the security of their beds, their dolls, their nighttime toys. My preparations complete, I rest my head against the hard, glass surface, and beyond the ever-watchful eyes of my children, I let my tears flow.

Morning brings sunshine and light, the white, warming light of the Mediterranean. Radio in hand, ready for news of war, I lounge in the shade of my door and observe my children, radiant in the freedom of play, their faces shining from the Israeli winter sun. My daughter's blonde frizz is a golden halo, a bobbing, swirling target for the baby's chubby grasp. In their path, their brothers tumble on the grass, more puppy-like than human, oblivious as the baby to my sudden interest in radio. Only my daughter, my nine-year-old, my eldest, knows enough to study my face.

I want her to observe my calm exterior. I step out into the sunshine and search back into my safe, middle-class Canadian upbringing, hoping to find some insight from its cool serenity and northern greyness that will guide me in this threatening, sun-drenched reality. I remember the secure, loving world of my

Yaron knew me well;
In the date trees we worked,
Tying eshkoliot for the harvest,
Where he, in a song of David Hamelech,
Showed me what I could be.

And there my eyes were adjusted,
To the sun-scorched, Beit She'an valley at noon,
When we stood proud on the high bended branch
Of a blooming etz tamar.

Exhaustion, despair have drained me childhood that blessed me with an inner strength and joy, yet surely did not raise me for this.

I listen to the radio and wait for news of an American invasion of Kuwait, a sure trigger for the promised launch of bombs towards Israel. My children's trusting faces look at me, believing in my powers.

The anticipated siren wakes us from our sleep, its blare a transgression of the sanctity of the kibbutz night's silence. The children's terror propels them into my bedroom. I seal the door with the tape and spread the wet towel along the space near the floor. The baby is hurriedly closed into her "gas mask," a plastic box hardly large enough to contain her. Her accusing, uncomprehending eyes, distorted through the plastic barrier, wound me even more than her unending shrieking. The other children scramble into their masks, and sit shivering from fear and cold beneath the passive, plastic facades.

I take one last, careful look at the room, remove my glasses, don my mask and enter a disorienting world of fuzzy blurs. Stifled, struggling to draw air through the filters, our nerves tortured by the baby's endless cries of terror and berayal, we feel more trapped than protected.

The radio is our contact with the world outside the room. Between reports on the damage and the continuing danger, popular music and dance tunes are broadcast in an effort to distract a nation sealed in isolated cells. By the time the radio releases us, we have learned, painfully, of the inadequacy of our preparations.

Thirsty, shaking with cold, our bladders aching, we burst out of the room three hours later.

The sunlight pouring in through the living room windows has no healing powers today. Exhaustion and despair have drained me of my usual resilence. The children are despondent from sleeplessness, yet even the baby is aware enough to find my unfamiliar containment distressing. They play quietly, yesterday's energy gone, while I devour the news.

Soon, there are phone calls from Canada, my family's voices full of love and concern. They buoy my spirits as surely as my ragged voice distresses them. Strengthened by their love, I hug the baby on my lap, and continue my obsession with the news, watching the war, watching ourselves.

The siren hurls us from our beds once again. Already battle-smart, we quickly run to the washroom before racing to my bedroom. Last one in the door, I look with satisfaction on the improvements – the thermos of hot tea, the colourful mugs, the cookie jar of homemade brownies, the emergency pail in the corner, the pile of extra blankets beside the bed. Uneasily, I choose calm over terror, though perhaps danger over safety, and decide that we are not wearing the masks tonight. I seal the door.

Drowsy baby in arms, I nestle in amongst my children, the extra blankets now covering us, creating a makeshift, woollen cave. We drink tea and talk and enjoy the newest jokes. My children giggle, their beautiful rolling giggles, at the silly stories I tell. We surrender to the warmth and coziness of our sealed room, our family shelter, while we share these stolen, wakeful moments in the dead of night.

The hot tea, the fresh brownies, the lazy waste of time, the camaraderie, and especially the children's laughter, throw me back to another time. I remember how I used to laugh, uncontrolled, unbridled, and at the slightest provocation. It was a glorious expression of the lightness of spirits and profound security I felt, a creation of the love so freely given me.

That laughter is gone, replaced by the weight of my love for my children. I hear their laughter, my lost laughter, that laughter that lives even in a sealed room, and know that the gift of my love has passed on what I enjoyed, when it was my time.

Trapped under the pile of blankets, the children's weight resting on me, I savour their delicious warmth.

On the Death of an Anti-Semite

by Joseph Fromstein

I heard that you had left this realm, just like some huge, decaying elm,
and it is hard to mourn,
for ever since the time we met,
I've had a feeling of regret that you were ever born.

I ventured to the funeral home, from which few patrons seem to roam,
to visit for a minute,
to view the casket on display,
before the onset of decay, and make sure you were in it.

So now that I am satisfied you did the proper thing, you died, may Fate no more abuse you,
so long as, when you reach the gate, you'll have along your store of hate,
and Hell will not refuse you.

The Doll

by Pearl Saban

In memory of Marjem Adler, 1927-1942

Her body,
tattered and torn,
discoloured dress
unravelling at the seams, face smudged with dirt.

But her eyes, lifelike in their ocean blue, stare unceasingly at the world – as if taking in all the fine details, as if memorizing them
for some future time.

The little girl clutches her prized possession.

Her dress, too, is tattered and torn, its yellow star fading, but not fast enough.
Her face, too, is smudged with dirt.
Her ocean-blue eyes,
so like the doll's
as they stare unceasingly at the world – as if documenting the fine details,
as if memorizing them
for some future time.

The child looks at the man who offer her pieces of chocolate.
"Czekolada, czekolada."
He holds out the treat to her.

She shakes her head no.

"Matka, Matka." Mother, Mother,
she replies.

"Nie zyje."
Dead, he says matter-of-factly.

And as the little girl holds her doll to her chest, she points to it.
"Lalka." Doll.
And then she points to herself.
"Matka."

Illusion

by Miriam Yosowich

Safety,
Illusion of a dismayed mind,
Hiding in my conscience.
Safety
Is just a black hollow bubble,
Once filled with a confident substance,
Now drained empty,
As it bursts on the streets of Jerusalem,
Bathing the holy city
In the blood of its natives,
Drowning the sounds of habitual life,
Of children laughing and playing,
People walking on the cobbled sidewalks,
Or lounging during a hectic afternoon
Along God's shore,
In a café or restaurant,
Having a cigarette, drinking a coke,
Until the peaceful bubble gushes open,
And splatters blood and dreams
Along the violent path
Of disillusioned freedom.
Safety,
A strange word
In the streets of Israel,
Is the illusion of many Who watch the news
In a movie-like trance
While others fight for the Impossible hallucination of peace.
We surround ourselves in a cocoon
Of disbelief
But our brittle silk shell
Won't save us from reality.
Safety is just another word
In the dictionary
That has become Meaningless.

Terror in the Land

by Miriam Weiner Preszow

Shalom! she called as they parted ways
It was the last time
A blaze of fire flashed in front of her
She was gone

He stood paralyzed
As he turned to see what had happened

Tears dripped slowly from his eyes
No! he shouted

Cries of horror were heard
Others were gone as well Blood was everywhere

Innocence, love, and peace will triumph
For her, for others who lay lifeless next to her
Their spirits will help to bring the peace we all seek Shalom

PASSOVER, THE CELEBRATION OF FREEDOM
Now, more than ever, let the young men and women of the

How to make kreplach...

By APRIL SHOUR LAUFER

My husband's parents, Bubie Annie and Zaidie Sam, were celebrating their 40th wedding anniversary and they had stopped by to see the kids. I was just in the midst of preparing dinner for the family and recipe books were lying open on the countertop next to the sink. Sam popped his head into the kitchen with a smile.

"You're making supper," he grinned.

"Yes," I said and walked over to kiss his cheek and say happy anniversary.

Annie came into the kitchen a minute later all smiles. "He's taking me to that fancy restaurant you told us about."

"Which one?" I asked.

"You know, the one on Wilson with that fancy chef."

"Oh, I hope you enjoy," I said, stirring the sauce boiling on the stove.

"Well," Sam said, wandering into the kitchen, "it won't be as good as Annie's cooking."

Then he added, "You use cookbooks." He said it as a kind of exclamation. I didn't know if he was impressed or surprised.

I said to Annie, "I should come over and get your recipes."

She looked at me smiling and said, "Really, you should come."

I thought for a second and asked, "Would you write them down for me?"

She looked uncertain. "Which one?"

"Well," I said. "How about the broccoli kugel, and maybe the Passover chocolate cake, and the children love your potato kugel, and the kreplach."

"And, and, and," interrupted Sam. "You'll have to come over and watch. Come Annie, we're going to be late," he said. "I made reservations," he announced proudly.

Turning to Annie, I said, "I'm going to come over."

"Good. Thursday, I'll make you some kreplach. You'll come and watch," Annie said.

I thought for a moment about what I had to do on Thursday, a whole week away, but still…

"Come," Sam called to Annie as he headed to the front door.

As they walked out the door, I thought of all the times I had promised to come and see how Annie made her famous meichels and had never done it. As they walked to their car in the driveway, I shouted after them, "Okay, I'll come."

"You're coming?" asked Sam.

"No, no. I mean to see Annie make the kreplach. What time?"

As Sam opened the car door for Annie, she thought for a moment biting her lower lip, then said, "Come around 11."

"Great," I shouted after them. "Thanks. Happy anniversary!"

The week passed quickly and on Wednesday night, I called to tell them I'd be there at 11 o'clock as promised.

"That's good," said Annie. "Everything will be ready."

When I arrived at the house, Annie and Sam were in the kitchen. There was a big pot already boiling on top of the stove. Sam was drying some cutlery. Annie gave me a hug.

"So," said Sam giving me a peck on the cheek. "You're ready?" He asked in his singsong voice.

"I forgot a piece of paper," I announced.

"A piece of paper," he repeated. "I suppose you want a pen, too."

I smiled.

Annie was busy at the counter rolling out some dough. I found a corner of the counter that wasn't being used and put the paper down so I could write down what to do. There was a container of meat sitting on the counter next to where Annie was rolling the dough.

"So," I said. "What do I do?"

"You roll out the dough like this," she answered.

Pesach: Feast of Unleaven

by Archie Rottenberg

Master of the universe, God,
We beg you once again to cause
That awful messenger of death,
The angel of terror, to pass
Over us, our homes and houses
Smeared with risen blood of innocents
Here and abroad everywhere
Throughout this supposed world
Created in your image, after your own
Likeness, ex nihilo, coming out
Of nothing, and more nihilistic
Now than good, religio ad
Absurdum in Your name.

Holy, holy holy,
War, not peace,
Land, not earth,
Space, not heaven,
Me, not you,
Mine all mine
From the beginning
Until forever.

Lord, bring us once again, now,
To observe, at least for seven days,
The Feast of Unleaven, sitting all Together even from darkest night
Till brightest morning in unfettered
Harmony, easing each our own
Pesach, sufficiency safe in Exalted exodus from foreign gods,
Rising up, then, at last to a new
And better world that will be truly
Very good.

... Or confessions of a failed kreplach maker

I watched as Annie moved the dough around on a butcher-block board, pulling here and there and working the rolling pin back and forth for several minutes.

With pen in hand I asked, "How thick should it be?"

Annie looked at me. She seemed a little puzzled by the question. She moved her hand across the dough. "Like this," she said.

My recipe books provided instructions like well-kneaded, or knead by hand for one to two minutes, or roll dough to 1/4-inch thickness. I looked at the dough. I bent down to see how thick it seemed. "A quarter of an inch?" I suggested.

Annie smiled a little.

"You make the meat first," Annie explained.

I looked at the bowl containing the ground meat.

"What do you use?" I asked.

"Well, you start with chicken thighs, maybe legs if they don't have thighs. And you add a piece of chuck."

I nodded. I had no idea how to do this. Maybe it was my seven years of being a vegetarian. I didn't even know what chuck looked like.

"So the meat cooks inside the dough," I asked uncertainly.

Annie paused as she was rolling out the dough.

"No," she looked at me, lifting up the bowl of meat. "It's cooked."

At that moment, a grinning Sam happened by and said in a whispered voice, "What do you think? She's been cooking since six this morning. She's already made 150 kreplach. These are just for you."

I looked at Annie and thought of the five hours she had already put into making the kreplach. A little hesitantly I asked what she did with the meat.

She was still rolling out the dough and answered absentmindedly. "You grind it up, cook it. Pepper, paprika, garlic."

"Okay," I said.

"Don't forget the oil," she said.

I had no clue.

"In the meat?" I asked, now feeling that I should be taking a first-year cooking course rather than skipping to the advanced level.

Sweat started on Annie's brow. "You sauté the meat till it's cooked."

By now, Annie had cut the dough into perfect little rectangles. She took a teaspoonful of the meat and placed it on one piece of the dough and showed me how to fold it. "Don't forget the onions."

I was lost.

I reminded myself that I was there to learn, so as bravely as I could I asked, "When do I add the onions?"

Annie kept making the kreplach. Without looking up, she said, "You put the onions in with the meat and cook it together."

As I was writing down the information, Annie added, "Don't forget to boil the chuck and the chicken first."

There were arrows and scribbles all over my piece of paper.

Annie wiped her brow with the back of her hand.

I was starting to feel that it was not going well, but I kept reminding myself that I was there to learn.

"How do I make the dough?" I asked in a voice that sounded timid even to me.

"Flour, an egg, salt," Annie answered as she took some more dough and was rolling it out.

I knew I was in trouble but I asked anyway, "How much?" I tried not to look at Annie.

"You take some flour. Maybe 2½, maybe three glasses full. It depends."

I took a peek at Annie, who was looking pretty stressed.

"I use a measuring cup," I said in an almost whisper.

Annie stopped making her kreplach. "Do I have a measuring cup?" she said quite loudly. I wasn't sure if she was asking Sam to come look for it, but then she started to rummage noisily through her pots and pans. After several minutes, she finally found it. She poured some water in the glass she used for measuring and then filled the measuring cup.

"It looks like it's an even cup," I said brightly.

"Like I said." Annie sighed.

I felt like I was sinking. With the faintest of conviction, I told myself one more time that I was there to learn.

"How much water?" I pretended to be busy writing something down and didn't look at Annie.

"A glass of water," she said.

I didn't dare ask if she used the same glass to measure the water.

"Anyways," she said, "You need to add a bit at a time until the dough feels right."

I was sunk.

The rest of the hour I spent watching Annie put her kreplach into the pot of boiling water. Each one floated to the surface in a synchronized dance of perfectly shaped and identical kreplach.

I left Annie's an hour later. She looked a bit tired. She didn't see me to the door but sat at the kitchen table and asked Sam to make her a tea.

As I left, a grinning Sam asked, "When are you going to have me over for your kreplach?"

I looked down at my scribbles, I looked up at Sam and said, "I'll let you know."

Rachatz

by Lisa Lidor

Cool water hand over hand falling in splashes to the silver bowl
our great-grandmother brought from a shtetl in Eastern Europe.

Burning water tears upon tears of the dark secrets and forgotten dreams
our mother never told us to save us the pain of knowing.

Salt water year after year
as cloudy water fills ancient vessels while we sit wondering in awe at the distance our sisters traveled hoping to one day be freed from our own slavery.

Fresh water miracle following miracle hidden within our lives like Miriam's Well quietly bubbling within our souls while we await our own exodus.

Recipe Box

by Deborah Sheppard

Her rounded writing stands upright in faded ink: date bars, lemon squares, flower garden cake,
genteel food for bringing over to the Anglicans' church bazaar or the Catholics' piano recital.
The cards nod discreetly to an indebtedness:
Sponge Cake (Bessie),
Dessert Cake — Bernice Engel,
Ann's Banana Bread.
My grandmother went to England in the Great War, nursing in the St. John's Ambulance Brigade.
Back home,
at the canasta games,
women's auxiliary lunches,
she sat at the head of long tables, pouring tea and water into translucent china,
a pot in each hand,
revealing her to be a true member of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire.

What I want are the muscular immigrant foods, the military-perfect squares of dough that only my grandfather was privileged to cut, in victory over his swollen, locked joints.
From his command post at the flour-strewn table, he'd criticize the seasoning, oversee how the filling was placed precisely in each centre,
the dumplings crimped,
fried, boiled, devoured.
My tongue longs for the soft cylinders that slide from marrow bones, fished from the cauldron of thick beans and barley and spread on challah bread that my mother gave me.
I want to breathe sweet onions, seared golden in schmaltz to anoint the fat-veined, purple-red brisket, cushioned by lima beans, carrots, potatoes, garlic, ginger, paprika, pepper, sealed in its black pot on Friday, ready for the village baker's oven,
and carried home for Shabbos dinner after shul.
The cholent surrenders its secrets through the shtetl streets, fragrance of diaspora floats to me, mother tongue I have only begun to learn.

My Mother's Cousin

by Deborah Sheppard

They turned gray
without my noticing, faces grew lines and soft folds of ancestral photos.
Edward turns seventy-five tomorrow.
I still see him as a boy of eight, says my mother,
the readiness for adventure, he'll try anything once.
Meyer is the oldest, the one who remembers the old country,
the bandit always in trouble,
his good heart now beyond the doctors.

I did not agree to this.
I want the pull of a different gravity:
cousins all gathered lakeside,
Adirondack chairs under poplar rustle,
crunch of mandelbroit,
powdered rainbow of Turkish delight.
With them I will always be Ruthie's child, free to play until dinner time on the flagstone patio, write messages on birchbark, to stuff into a bottle, float down the lake to the river and away.

2002 Literary Supplement
Passover Greetings

Don't live at home without it!

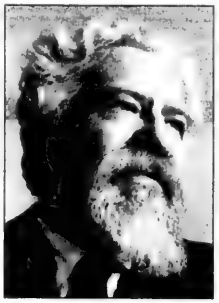
By ALLAN GOULD

There was a TV and magazine commercial several years ago—was it for American Express?—that went, "Don't leave home without it!" As this author and journalist recalls, it referred to not daring to venture out into the street without a credit card, or you'd be in Big Trouble. (As if the Jews don't have enough troubles already.)

Which explains, I hope, the title of this essay, in honour of the Passover holiday season: What books should every Jew not "live at home" without? What Jewish books should we always have around, that, like a good credit card, we can reach for when we truly need them?

The question of a good Jewish home library probably became slightly less important with the rise of quality Jewish public libraries in our great cities.

So, if we've got decent public libraries, then why have a home library? Certainly, every traditional Jew has a library overflowing with sfarim – copies of the Five Books of Moses, Mishnah, tractates of Talmud, and other holy tomes; this is as logical and necessary to religious Jews as a tallit or yarmulke.



Abraham Joshua Heschel

But what about secular Jewish books that are not in Hebrew or Aramaic? Are there many that we really should not "live at home" without? Books that allow us to sleep better, knowing that they will always be within reach, whether for a smile or an inspirational thought; a good cry or a consoling insight?

I think so. The Encyclopedia Judaica is certainly wonderful to have at home, and, in spite of its rapid "dating" – has it been three decades since it was published? – one finds it welcome on many occasions. (I recall looking up "Murray Perahia" recently, after my wife Merle and I heard the fine pianist perform with the Toronto Symphony, wondering if he were Jewish. And there he was: born in New York, of Sephardi heritage (Of course! Perahia, from perach – flower! Why hadn't we thought of that?)

Let me share a list with you – a highly-personal list, of course – of books which I have often found even more precious to have in our home than any credit card.

Judaism:

This is a toughie (but then, all the categories are). As a committed, serious, but non-halachic Jew, I struggle over which "bible" is best to own and use regularly. The recent Everett Fox translation of The Five Books of Moses is extraordinary, and enormously helpful for both study and insight; his scholarly looks at the meanings and puns behind every Hebrew word are powerful. The new United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism has a new, if terribly costly, commentary, Etz Hayim, which many literalists will find troubling, but which has stunning, invaluable Midrashic sections. Probably the most satisfying, relatively new, translation of our Torah is the Jewish Publication Society's five-volume set: archaeological yet "frum," it is a must for most Jewish homes.

How about Basic Judaism – the title of Milton Steinberg's 1947 classic, now terribly out-of-date? Prof. Emil Fackenheim's What is Judaism? is highly recommended as a brilliant, intelligent, solid, beautifully-written and loving study of what our great faith and people are all about.

I also urge you to create an Abraham Joshua Heschel mini-library: his Israel: An Echo of Eternity, written in the rush of pride and spiritual joy that followed the Six Day War of 1967, is a poetic and deeply-moving declaration of the centrality of the Jewish State – and Jerusalem – to our people, history and faith. And, while his Man's Quest for God and God in Search of Man are both essential reading, the one, single, must-own book of this giant has to be The Sabbath. If there is any one book that captures the glory of this most specific of Jewish concepts, as well as its spiritual and moral underpinnings, it would be this thin paperback. It may well be the most important single book that I shall refer to in this too-brief essay.

What makes a good personal Jewish library?

As for actual day-to-day living as a traditional Jew, one cannot do better than The Jewish Holidays: A Guide & Commentary by Michael Strassfeld. Or maybe you can: an Orthodox Jewish couple in New York have affected tens of thousands with their exquisite prose and loving explanations of being an active, "frumme yid": Blu Greenberg's How to Run a Traditional Jewish Household may be out-of-print, but beg, borrow or steal a copy. And, arguably, the most meaningful, moving, often enthralling study of each and every Jewish yomtov is her husband Yitz Greenberg's The Jewish Way: Living the Holidays. There may not be any book in my own Jewish library that I refer to more frequently: when Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot roll around each year – come to think of it, when Purim, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and the rest do, as well – Rabbi Yitz's is the book I grab eagerly from the shelf. What love, what understanding, what glorious passionate commentary!

Jewish History:

Many of the best histories, such as those by Salo Baron, Simon Dubnow, Solomon Grayzel and Max Margolis/ Alexander Marx, are either miserably out-of-date or dreadfully dry. Others, by Cecil Roth and Max Dimont, are a bit "too popular" and filled with error – especially the latter.

Martin Gilbert

Arguably one of the better Jewish historians writing today is Martin Gilbert, who frequently turns out books of well-written and very reliable scholarship: The Jews in the Twentieth Century, only recently published, is handsomely illustrated and very satisfying; his Israel: A History, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century, The Atlas of Jewish History and The Holocaust: A History of the Jews of Europe during the Second World War are all excellent, with the latter being especially noteworthy in its reliance upon hundreds of diaries and personal recollections of both the murdered and the survivors.

Canada has its own experts on the Holocaust, of course. University of Toronto's Michael Marrus's works are extremely scholarly and worthwhile, if occasionally hard on the non-student, and, of course, Irving Abella and Harold Tropper's None Is Too Many remains the single most important study of the outrageous way Canadian officials kept our fellow Jews out of this golden land when their decision was, most literally, life or death. (The American equivalent, Arthur D. Morse's While Six Million Died, also remains a classic, and should be owned and read as well.)

Jewish Literature:

Regarding "Holocaust literature," we all have read Holocaust books that have shaken us to our very core. There is no question that Elie Wiesel's Night should be in every Jewish home. And as far as anthologies of writings from that agonizing period – both fictional and historical – I have never, ever discovered a single one that could match the brilliance of Arthur H. Friedlander's Out of the Whirlwind: A Reader of Holocaust Literature. It is now, thankfully, back in print, just over three decades after it was first published, and in a reasonably priced paperback. I used this text when I taught the Holocaust at various synagogues in Toronto in the 1970s and 1980s, and it is probably the one volume I would give to anyone – Jew or Gentile.

Why do I cherish this volume so much? Because it is so cautious, so sensitive, so respectful, as well as so historically and literarily valuable. For example, a selection from Anne Frank's diary is followed by an outlandish Bruno Bettelheim attack on her family for not getting out of Europe, (!) but rather trying to live their lives normally in wartime. His essay also includes a legitimate rage against the wishy-washy 1950s (Pulitzer-prize-winning!) play, based on that precious diary, which lets the audience off the hook: "If all men are basically good," Bettleheim quotes the last line of the mediocre drama, "then there never was an Auschwitz." And the book does not merely pile on the horrors, which certainly took place, but also is wise enough to describe what was lost: the amazingly rich culture of eastern Europe. Out of the Whirlwind is a truly glorious book.

Amichai's love poems among best

Two more thoughts on Holocaust literature: one is to urge everyone to own – and read – the best book ever written on that era, at least in this critic's mind: Andre Schwartz-Bart's The Last of the Just. It is sheer perfection, and if the last few pages do not break your heart, you do not have one. The other thought is even more important: the Holocaust, like any historical event, can be corrupted, diminished, violated, vulgarized. The hero of the fight against this dangerous tendency is an astoundingly wise professor, Lawrence Langer. Not all of his books are still in print, but several are, and in low-priced paperbacks: The Holocaust and the Literary Imagination, Preempting the Holocaust, Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memory and Admitting the Holocaust are among the most vital books of the past quarter-century, and at least one of them should be in every Jewish library.

As for poetry, one cannot ignore the greatness of Canada's own A.M. Klein, Irving Layton and Leonard Cohen, but much of their writing is uneven, or terribly difficult to understand and appreciate. If I had to choose one Jewish poet of the past half-century, it would have to be the recently-deceased Yehuda Amichai of Israel. There are several decent volumes of his work in excellent translation – some of them, happily, with the original Hebrew on one side of the page and English on the other – and I urge you to read them. His love poems are among the best in centuries – but his poems about Jerusalem, about war, about survival, about the Holocaust, are simply astonishing. When I taught my students Amichai – as I recently did in a lecture series on Jewish literature – they were gasping; sometimes fighting back tears. To quote a great literary critic, "When Amichai is at his best, he is the best." I agree. What a poet!

You probably don't need me to tell you every good home library should have a good translation of the stories of S.J. Agnon, Mendel Mocher Seforim, I.L. Peretz and, of course, the giant of the giants, Shalom Aleichem. As for the latter, all I can do is to quote an English professor of mine from my university days, who grew up in a Yiddish home. He once cornered me in a hallway and said to me, "Mr. Gould, do you read Shalom Aleichem in Yiddish?" "Alas, no," I told him; "my Yiddish is very weak." "What a shame," he smiled. "Much of his style is superior to Shakespeare." I remember being awe-struck by his words, and vowing to read the great humorist and author. And although I continue to read Shalom Aleichem in translation, I never fail to be impressed by his grandeur.

As for Canadian and American Jewish fiction, one cannot ignore Mordecai Richler, whom we lost only last year to a too-early death. Many Jews rail against his purported "anti-Semitism," because he was so critical, often mocking, of our people and faith. (The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz is a fine novel, but hardly one I would use to introduce Jewishness to the outside world.) But I urge you to go back to some of his essays or short stories (in the latter case, The Street, a delightful collection about growing-up Jewish in postwar Montreal), and what I think was his most successful, funniest, yet most touching novel, St. Urbain's Horseman. This man could write.

American Jewish fiction? Well, I would certainly include Joseph Heller's Catch-22, arguably the most hilarious and most daring satire of war ever written. (And profoundly Jewish in its world-view as well, once you recognize, as Heller admitted, that the protagonist Yossarian was, of course, a Jewish character; the author chose an Armenian name – maybe because they had their own "holocaust" before and during World War I? – to make the book slightly more universal.) The book is fabulous, and, since my son Judah and I had a tradition of reading long novels aloud to each other when he was in his teens, I have had the pleasure of hearing it as well as reading it. Sheer joy, laughter, horrors and tears, from the first page to the last.

A. M. Klein

Among American Jewish short-story writers, I have my own two favourites: Grace Paley and Bernard Malamud. Both of them have collections still in print which are low-priced and spectacular in their style, wit, and sheer haimishe nature. And how can one talk about Jewish literature without discussing Philip Roth? Too many Jews gave up on him after Goodbye, Columbus. But Roth, more than any other writer of the past few decades, has grown and matured and become one of the most amazing stylists of our era. My favourites: The Counterlife (which is about Israel, as well as about being a Jew in the 20th century; not an easy read, but sheer genius), and American Pastoral, about a Jewish man who discovers that his daughter is involved with violent, radical political activism. It is nothing less than amazing.

(We all have our own quirks, and here, I confess, is mine: when I read a book that has me shaking my head in awe and excitement, I tend to "flag" – you know, use those sticky, yellow notes – the pages that I can hardly wait to read to Merle, my wife of 33 years. After I had put stickers into about four-dozen of the first 75 pages, I stopped. Philip Roth has gone far, far beyond his early, skilled, promising, but terribly-over-praised short stories and novels. American Pastoral, now in a fair-priced paperback, will burn a hole in your memory and your soul.)

Final thoughts on Jewish writing? Well, few recent writers have impressed me more than Allegra Goodman, and I sense that she could well become the Orthodox Jewish female (really! all three!) equivalent of a Paley or Malamud, or at least in the same ballpark of talent. I am mortified to admit that I have not yet read her earlier novels, Paradise Park and The Family Markowitz, but I was simply "wowed" by Kaaterskill Falls, a finely-crafted, Jane-Austen-like study of an Orthodox Jewish community in the Catskills. I have never seen "modern Orthodoxy" described with such skill, such love, such talent – and the story is a solid one, about the transference of leadership from a rabbi to one of his sons. The name of the novel might not be particularly memorable (Kaaterskill Falls?), but it is one that will bring you great satisfaction, knowledge and pleasure.

'Singer could write like an angel'

And a more personal note: when I was working on my master's degree in New York City, many hundreds of years ago, I befriended, through sheer chutzpah, Isaac Bashevis Singer. (He was in the Manhattan phone book; I phoned him up; we had a dozen dairy lunches over the years). Although "Bashevis" moved to New York just before the Holocaust (of which he once told me, "I regret that I did not have the honour of being with my fellow eastern European Jews at that time"), he wrote mainly on the shtetls of Poland until his death several years ago.

Isaac Bashevis Singer

So where to place him in this essay: Holocaust literature? (Look at Enemies, A Love Story, surely one of his best). Jewish history? (In My Father's Court, and the inferior but still quite delightful More Stories of My Father's Court, the latter only recently translated from his old columns in The Forward, are among the best descriptions of life in the early 20th century in eastern Europe that have ever been captured.) American Jewish literature? (Shadows on the Hudson, published just after his death, is all about Holocaust survivors living in New York, and often reaches the peaks of greatness achieved in his much-earlier historical novels, The Manor and The Estate.) And how can I not mention his early novels, Satan in Goray and The Slave, and his early (and best, I feel) short story collections, Gimpel the Fool and Short Friday?

We Jews did not need the Nobel Prize awarded to I.B. Singer to tell us what a fantastic writer he was (and in all senses of that word; who else could make dybbuks, demons and devils seem more real than our next-door neighbour, who probably suffers from all three, anyway?) Of course, we Jews have had several other Nobel Prize winners for literature, including the great American writer Saul Bellow, now in his mid-80s and still producing superior books, though his literary complexity made me choose to leave him off this list.

Singer was a cantankerous, vain, often difficult man, but he could write like an angel, and I believe that we must turn to him when we truly need to know what it was like to be a Jew three centuries ago (as in The Slave), or in the early 20th century (as in his Father's Court books), or during and after the Holocaust (Enemies). But are Singer's books important enough, entertaining enough, precious enough, to be included in the company of the others listed throughout this essay? I think so, without any hesitation.

How to conclude? Why not with a brief quote from one of the greatest works ever produced by a Jew – and one that should undoubtedly be in every Jewish library as the ones listed above: Kohelet, alias Ecclesiastes: "Of making many books there is no end."

Indeed. And of reading many books, there should be no end. If running off to your local Jewish public library is sufficient for you, then fine; I urge you to visit our country's handful of JPLs whenever possible.

In the meantime, I think the above list may be a nice start for anyone's "Jewish home library." Of course, it's highly personal, and, for length reasons alone, it's very truncated. Still, it's a beginning. And as we all know from the opening word of our Holy Torah, "in the beginning," is when everything happened, yes?

Allan Gould is, most important, the proud father of Judah Jonathan and Elisheva Sarit. He has written 30 books, including two in the field of Judaica (which he reluctantly left off this list): the humourous Unorthodox Book of Jewish Records and Lists and the scholarly anthology, What Did They Think of the Jews? And he never misses an issue of the Canadian Jewish News.

On the occasion of

it is tradition to make a charitable donation in memory of a loved one or friend.

As Yiskor is observed during Passover, it is a time to remember.

יזכור

For they offered charity for the memory of their souls

בעד הזכרת נשמתם בעבור שנדבו לצדקה

This mitzvah of "tzedekah" translates into action the promises we make during Yiskor prayers.

"May the words of our mouths become the deeds of our hands."

Let the memory of our loved ones guarantee the future of the Jewish people, and all of Israel.

A more repulsive obscenity

Just as people were sitting down to mark the beginning of Passover last week in Netanya, a suicide bomber struck, killing 21 people and wounding more than 100. Amid the debris of the dining room is a painfully poignant reminder of what the seder might have been. [Israel photo]

Editorial

The obscenity of mass murder was made even more horribly repulsive and more obscene last week. When Hamas chose the start of the Passover holiday as its signal to wantonly slaughter more defenceless, helpless Jews, men, women and children, it crossed into new psychological terrain.

And no Jew on earth could fail to recognize its vile and ghoulish markers: pogrom. The Netanya attack had about it the unmistakably foul and putrid air of a pogrom. Jewish life was deliberately taken on a quintessentially, overtly Jewish moment of the calendar.

It was therefore, alas, somehow even more obscene than the massacres that have preceded it.

Can there be any doubt that the Hamas campaign of suicide bombing is less an instrument of national liberation than it is of religiously motivated genocide?

As of this writing, there have been four more suicide attacks and numerous other attacks against Jews in Israel since that first attack at the start of Passover. Forty-eight civilians have been killed in these latest attacks.

Since September 2000, when Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat rejected making peace in favour of his campaign of blood and murder, more than 400 people have been killed in Israel by his terrorism. A comparable figure in Canada would be some 2,000 Canadians killed over the same period of time.

How would we expect our own government to react in similar circumstances?

A comparable figure in the United States would be some 20,000 Americans murdered.

How would we expect the American government to react in the circumstances? How has the American government responded to the murder of some 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11?

Both governments would react exactly as the government of Israel has – by mobilizing its armed forces to seek out and destroy the infrastructure within Palestinian society that has decreed that Israel and its Jews must die. No other response is acceptable or moral under the circumstances.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Infiltrators Killed

JERUSALEM — Israel last week killed four infiltrators who entered the Golan Heights area from across the Jordanian border, near the Sea of Galilee. Three were shot dead immediately and another was caught and killed after a chase across the Golan Heights. Two other members of the squad were killed on the other side of the border by Jordanian forces.

WORLD

Trip Cancelled

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum has cancelled a trip for its staff to attend a survivors' conference in Israel. Security concerns for staff were paramount, according to a spokesperson. The conference is scheduled to take place at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem from April 8-11.

Porn Film Canned

PRAGUE — Czech officials have quashed plans to shoot scenes for an adult film at the former wartime transit camp of Terezin. Officials banned the use of video cameras at Terezin after reports that a pornographic movie would be shot there. The move came after a Czech tabloid reported that the film would recount the rape of women by Nazis.

Holocaust Centre

BUDAPEST — Hungary has approved the establishment of a public foundation for a Holocaust centre to commemorate the 600,000 Hungarian Jews who died during World War II. The centre will include a museum housed in a former synagogue. The government will pay $530,000 to renovate the run-down building.

Swiss Criticized

BERNE — Switzerland avoided its responsibilities to victims of the Nazis, says an international panel of historians. In a final report after a five-year study of Switzerland's wartime role, the nine-member panel said the country's neutrality was abused to justify business dealings with the Axis powers. The panel criticized Switzerland's refugee policy that turned away thousands to near-certain death. The report also criticizes the nation's excessive co-operation with Nazi Germany and bad restitution policies.

Body Parts Buried

VIENNA — The body parts of executed opponents of the Nazis were buried in Vienna's central cemetery last month, after being used for research by scientists and medical students until only a few years ago. The burial of the bones and tissue in a communal grave marks the end of a grisly chapter in the University of Vienna's history. The university started investigating the origins of body parts used at its anatomy institute after Yad Vashem alleged it had used the corpses of death camp victims for its celebrated anatomy handbook, the Pernkopf Atlas.

Editor Apologizes

RIYADH — A Saudi editor has apologized for an article in a government-run daily that said Jews use human blood to make Purim hamantaschen. "What has been mentioned by this writer is wrong. It neither reflects the opinion of the al-Riyadh newspaper nor the Saudi government," the editor stated last month.

Graham Defends Mideast Speech

QUEBEC CITY — Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham said some listeners overreacted to his speech last month before the Canada-Israel Committee when he criticized both the Israeli military and Palestinian suicide bombers and called for an end to Mideast bloodshed.

"I felt that it (the response) was somewhat exaggerated," Canadian Press quoted Graham as saying last week.

"Some people were concerned about the reference but the vast majority of Canadians have supported, basically, what I was saying," Graham said

Some who attended his March 6 speech to the CIC's annual policy meeting jeered him when he said, in response to a question, he had no knowledge that Canada has funded Palestinian education materials with anti-Semitic themes.

Graham defended his remarks.

"When you read the speech in its totality, there was a balance there," he said last week. "I wasn't seeking to criticize anyone. What I was trying to do is say, 'Look, we all have to create a situation where peace will prevail.' That's what I was trying to do in that speech."

He said he understands Israeli concerns, but repeated that peace is the only solution for the region.

"I think some people [are] concerned that a criticism of Israel would be perceived badly at this time, when they need support. And I quite understand that; they're being attacked.

"But what we urge is that that defence be exercised in a way that doesn't destroy the possibility of a negotiated, peaceful settlement in the end. Because that's the only way we'll get out of this mess."

Christian coalition backs Palestinians

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Re porter

TORONTO — A leading Canadian Christian social justice coalition has urged the federal government to abandon its traditional even-handedness in the Middle East and help impose an end to Israel's "illegal" occupation of "Palestinian territories."

In a March 13 letter to Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, KAIROS, the Canadian Ecumenical Justice Initiative, criticizes Israel's military incursions into Palestinian areas, portraying Palestinian suicide bombings as reprisals for Israeli aggression.

"The last 18 months have been filled with horrifying violence and a steady increase in injury and deaths, but this past week has witnessed new heights in the wanton disregard for life and property," the coalition's letter to Graham states. "Israeli military incursions into densely populated areas, such as the refugee camps in Bethlehem and most recently, the total occupation of Ramallah, and Palestinian reprisals in the form of suicide bombings and rifle attacks, have resulted in dozens of civilian deaths."

KAIROS, which promotes human rights, justice and peace around the world, seeks "an immediate cease-fire [that] must be implemented to avoid massive further casualties." As well, the letter states, "UN monitors are desperately needed to make such a cease-fire hold. Israel has long resisted the presence of UN monitors and we ask that you stress to the Israelis their utility for ensuring the security of both peoples."

Founded last July, the Toronto-based coalition brings together social justice and peace groups from Canada's Catholic, Anglican, Reformed, Mennonite, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Quaker and United churches.

The churches fund the coalition, which, in turn, is said to function at arm's length from the churches.

The churches, states the letter to Graham, "have consistently stated that addressing the illegal occupation of Palestinian territories by Israel is fundamental. Canada's official position holds the occupation to be illegal and in contravention of UN Security [Council] Resolutions 242 and 338."

(Canada's long-held official position, according to background notes from the Department of Foreign Affairs, is that Ottawa "does not recognize" Israel's occupation, but considers settlements as "contrary to international law.")

While acknowledging the importance of negotiations between the parties, KAIROS says "there are also times when international law must simply be implemented. We think this is a direction that ultimately may avoid many more years of bloodshed and misery in the Middle East and ask [Graham] to consider support for such an initiative."

Eric Vernon, director of government relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said KAIROS' view is based on erroneous interpretations of Canadian policy and the two UN resolutions.

Vernon pointed out that Resolution 242, passed in 1967 after the Six Day War, recognizes the right of all states to exist within secure borders and recognized boundaries, and the need for Israeli withdrawal "from territories occupied in the recent conflict."

Resolution 338 of 1973 calls for the implementation of Resolution 242 and negotiations between the parties.

Vernon said Canada has endorsed both measures, and a cornerstone of its Mideast policy is that a just and lasting peace can only be reached as a result of direct negotiations between the parties.

"[The UN resolutions] clearly state that [Israel's occupation] is not in contravention of international law. And they, like Canada, also call for direct negotiations between the parties," Vernon told The CJN.

Any attempt by Canada or other countries to impose a settlement on Israel would be untenable anyway, he said.

And he wondered to what extent KAIROS represents the views of Canada's Christian churches.

"Is this a convenient way for the churches to slam Israel?" Vernon asked. "If not, where are the mainstream voices?"

Remembering the Rim

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prior to the sinking of the Struma, before the departure of the Exodus, at a time when the cry of "Dirty Jews, go to Palestine" was commonly heard in Europe, a barely seaworthy fishing boat set sail for the promised land with hundreds of Jewish refugees on board.

Foreshadowing the voyages of other vessels attempting to bring European Jews to safety, the Rim left Constanza, Romania in the summer of 1939 bound for Palestine, where it hoped to disembark its passengers in a clandestine nighttime aliyah.

David Samuel, 82, was one of almost 800 passengers on board the Rim. Memories of his youthful adventure came streaming back when he recently viewed a screening of The Struma, the Simcha Jacobivici film about the doomed freighter of the same name, sunk in 1942 in the Black Sea by a Russian torpedo. Only one of the Struma's 778 passengers survived.

The fate of the Rim's passengers was more fortunate. Like the Struma, the Rim was filled with Jews fleeing the Nazis, or others, like Samuel, hoping to fulfill a Zionist dream.

From the onset, their voyage was fraught with danger and adventure.

Departing Constanza with hundreds of Romanian, Austrian and Czech Jews on board, the Rim steamed through the Black Sea towards the Promised Land. As Samuel tells it, the Rim was not much more than a rickety old barge, made of wood, held together with wire and spit.

David Samuel

After passing through the Bosporus and Dardanelles, the Rim steamed into the Aegean Sea. That's where things began to go terribly wrong. On a blazing hot summer day, "all of a sudden, we saw fire at the back of the boat. The crew brought water in buckets, because the fire was in the main engine room."

With the fire appearing to rage out of control, the crew aimed the ship towards a small island. As it neared shore, several of the more athletic passengers, including Samuel, jumped into the water and swam. The crew, meanwhile, managed to run the boat aground on the island. The passengers were saved but the fire gutted almost the entire ship, destroying much of the passengers' food and possessions.

Samuel, who had joined Mizrachi Zionist groups as a youth in his hometown of Cluj, was the only member of his family on board. He had left behind his parents and two sisters for a new life in Palestine. But on that summer day, it appeared he would get no further than that Aegean island.

Fate, in the form of the Italian navy, intervened. An Italian warship that had been sent to investigate was ordered by Mussolini to ferry the passengers to Rhodes, then under Italian control.

Well-treated by the Italians, the passengers were allowed to leave when the Jewish Agency arranged to send a boat, the Aghios Nicholaus, tugged by three smaller boats, to bring the refugees to Palestine.

As they neared the region's Western coastline for a surreptitious night time landing, British planes fired flares and strafed the water. Samuel, who was 18 at the time, was on a small boat that avoided the shooting and made its way to shore. Many were captured but Samuel jumped into the water and swam the last 100 metres to shore, reaching ground around Netanya.

"All of a sudden, I felt under my feet solid ground. I was so happy."

Looking the worse for wear and wearing only underpants, he walked into town. A Hebrew building sign announcing, "Kol Noa Esther," a movie theatre, made him feel at home.

Luckily, he was taken in by a Jewish couple who recognized he was a refugee. They fed him and put him in touch with the Jewish underground, which was able to get him proper papers and arrange work for him in an orchard.

It looked like his life was calming down, but only a short time later, war erupted in Europe. Samuel volunteered for the British armed forces. He entered the Royal Engineers and in 1942 saw action in the Middle East and Italy.

War's end saw Samuel stationed in Venice. A chance encounter brought him together with an old classmate from Cluj, who told him he had seen his father a few months before, in Dachau, and suggested he might still be alive.

Obtaining leave from his commanding officer, Samuel travelled to Germany, hoping to be reunited with his father, Yehiel.

In July, he introduced himself to an American officer at Dachau, asking for a list of prisoners. There on the list, was his father's name.

A few minutes later he was in a prisoners' barracks "and I immediately recognized my father even though I hadn't seen him for six years."

"There were people lying in bunks, like skin and bones. Everybody looked and didn't say a word.

"My father was at a sink and I embraced him and kissed him and said, 'daddy, don't you recognize me?' He said, 'no, my son is in Palestine and he's not a soldier.'"

"So I took out a family picture and showed it to him and he fainted.

"Everybody in the bunks started crying."

Afterwards, his father told him about a dream he'd had in the concentration camp. In it "his only son arrived by plane and liberated the camp. He told him he can choose 10 people, and take them with him," Samuel recalled.

Samuel spent seven days in Dachau before his leave was up and he had to return to duty. In the meantime he made arrangements to bring his father to Palestine. His father immigrated there in November 1945.

Like other Jewish soldiers in Europe, Samuel helped smuggle Holocaust survivors to Palestine. While in Salzburg, he met some Hungarian girls and struck up a conversation. A year later, he met the same girl on a beach in Tel Aviv, and ended up marrying her. Elizabeth had been imprisoned in Auschwitz, where most of her family was killed.

In December 1945, Samuel returned to Cluj to search for family members. He learned that his mother, Chana, and one of his sisters, Sarah, along with her six-year-old son, Efraim, had been gassed in Auschwitz. A survivor told him the story. The child was with his grandmother when Sarah was sent to another line. When the boy began to cry for his mother, Mengele asked her if he was her son. Yes, she replied, at which Mengele told her she had better join him. As a result, all three were killed. His other sister, Rachel, survived by immigrating to Palestine in 1941.

From May 1944 on, his father kept a diary describing his experiences. The book, titled Crematorium of Lice, concludes with the story of his liberation by his son.

The original of the diary has been in Yad Vashem since 1964. A Hebrew language translation was published last year.

Memories of his wartime experiences came flooding back when he saw the film about the Struma. He recalled a second cousin, "a beautiful 18-year-old girl on board who died with the rest of the passengers."

When he saw the movie, "I felt like I was there too."

Fate was more fortunate for the passengers on the Rim. As far as he knows, all eventually made it to Israel. "None were killed by the Nazis."

Restoration fund set up for Anshei Minsk

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A fund has been established to help restore the fire-damaged Anshei Minsk Synagogue.

The Anshei Minsk Restoration Fund was created to help repair the damage from an arson attack last month, said Rabbi Shmuel Spero, the shul's spiritual leader. More than $100,000 in damage was caused when an unknown arsonist entered the shul's upper balcony and set fire to wooden pews and boxes of holy books.

In the weeks since the fire, the shul has been inundated by calls from well-wishers (including a letter of support from outgoing Premier Mike Harris), offers of help, and expressions of solidarity from other faith groups. Some have also offered donations, Rabbi Spero said.

Money raised through the restoration fund will help improve the downtown building beyond the repairs covered by the shul's insurance coverage, Rabbi Spero said. It will also allow the synagogue to beef up its security measures to make future incidents less likely.

Despite the extensive damage to the balcony level, regular synagogue activities barely skipped a beat. A previously planned Shabbaton went ahead with 100 people enjoying a Friday-evening meal on tables set up in the shul's vestibule and sanctuary. Daily minyans also continued and the shul announced it would not change its plans to offer two free Passover seders.

Expressions of support came from a variety of sources. A group of 50 young people from St. Frances Xavier Catholic Secondary School in Mississauga visited the shul to offer both moral support and a $600 donation. They contributed the sum, raised from their lunch money, to help restore and replace the shul's religious books.

High school students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto also volunteered to help clean the shul prior to Passover.

In addition, Canadian Jewish Congress has helped arrange for a grant from Heritage Canada to fund the restoration of the shul's smoke- and water-damaged books. It took a crew four days to carefully pack the books and individual sheets in rice paper before shipping them to Montreal, where they will undergo a process to remove mould and moisture. The restoration process could take up to a year to complete.

Entertainers from the Kensington Market area have announced they will hold a benefit concert on April 7 at Holy Joe's (651 Queen St. West) to help raise funds to repair the synagogue.

"There is very good support that has come from all of this," Rabbi Spero said. "A lot of people want to help out. It's nice. Various synagogues have called, sent letters, support, cheques. People are really trying."

For more information, or to contribute to the restoration fund, call the synagogue at 416-595-5723.

Hebrew U conference to explore current issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A postal code is a better predictor than Jewish education of intermarriage, says an American-born, Israel-based sociologist who co-authored a book on Jewish identity in the United States.

Steven Cohen, a faculty member of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, will open the Best of Hebrew U, a weekend conference being held here on April 13 and 14. He will speak on Changing Contours of Jewish Identity in North America at Holy Blossom Temple on the evening of April 13.

The following day will offer a smorgasbord of three consecutive concurrent sessions at the Inn on the Park Hotel, by Cohen and a half dozen of his colleagues: history professor Menahem Ben-Sasson; Tova Hartman Halbertal of the Melton Centre, whose areas of expertise include feminism and Jewish tradition; Marilyn Koolik, director of the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive; Meron Medzini, visiting senior lecturer in political science; history professor and Islamic expert Emanuel Sivan; and genetic researcher Maya Schuldiner.

The day will conclude with a panel discussion entitled After September 11 – Three Views from Israel. Other topics will include Raising Feminist Children in Jewish Tradition, the History of Yiddish Film, the Cairo Geniza, the Stem Cell Dilemma, and Israel's Options following a year and a half of terror.

On the Sunday, Cohen, the keynote speaker, will discuss the Rise of Personalism and Building Meaningful Jewish Communities for Personalist Jews.

Although his expertise is focused on American Jewry, there's been a more widespread trend toward religious individualism and Jewish personalism, Cohen said last week in a phone interview from Israel.

"[Jews today] are not as responsive as their parents were 20 or 30 years ago to external forces and ideas like Jewish law, the Holocaust and the State of Israel. All these things they see as being outside themselves and are powerful only if they attribute personal meaning to them, which many people do."

Although Birthright Israel – the free Israel trip for Jews between the ages of 18 and 26 – is "a great example of how to address these trends," the cultural forces are too big to be reversed by anything, he said.

Generally speaking, Canadian Jews are more Jewishly involved, more "engaged," and less feminist than their American counterparts, Cohen noted.

Among the findings in The Jew Within: Self, Family and Community in America – the 2000 book he co-authored with Arnold Eisen of Stanford University – are the emergence of "volunteerism" (picking and choosing what aspects of Judaism to observe), anti-judgmentalism, a search for meaning, and the irrelevance of Jewish organizations to more than 40 per cent of those interviewed for the book.

Intermarriage is both a cause and result of assimilation, said Cohen. People most likely intermarry when they have weaker social ties to other Jews, he added. Although Jewish education has been a prime focus for community leaders concerned about intermarriage, "we also have to recognize that we can do well trying to build strong connections among Jews." Those include focusing on places where young people are likely to meet Jewish friends and marriage partners, such as universities with large Jewish student populations, he said.

Cohen and his co-author were accused of hostility toward intermarriage by Ed Case, publisher of InterfaithFamily.com, but Cohen denies he is hostile to intermarried families, some of whom are among his best friends, he said.

"We are deeply pessimistic about the impact of intermarriage on the Jewishness of the families," he clarified. "I think intermarriage is bad for Jewish continuity and for the Jewish community. That's not hostile."

Registration for the Sunday session is $75, $50 for students. The keynote lecture on Saturday night is free. Further information can be found online at www.cfhu.org or by calling 416-485-8000.

A greater obscenity

Israel has repeatedly tried to find an accommodation with its Palestinian neighbours. It no more wishes to rule over three million Palestinians than those Palestinians wish to have Israel rule over them. But the high imperative to protect its citizens outweighs any other at the moment. Moreover, the ever disquieting question still remains: with whom can it reach such an accommodation?

Can it do so with Hamas, Islamic Jihad or Hezbollah, whose unashamedly and publicly proclaimed raison d'être is the elimination of Israel and the killing of Jews? Would Canada negotiate with Hamas in similar circumstances?

Can Israel, then, find accommodation with Yasser Arafat? By his own actions, he shows it cannot and it must not.

It is incontrovertibly true, as Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told the world on the weekend, that Arafat is the head of the terror infrastructure operating against Israel. He orders, incites, abets and shelters terrorists. His own Fatah militia members take part in the terrorism.

Yasser Arafat is the designer of the double strategy: kill the Jews and cry to the cameras.

In his address to the nation on Sunday, Sharon correctly asserted that Israel "is at war" with the forces that seek to destroy it. Those forces, he aptly noted, will also seek, eventually, to destroy the West as well.

It was a point poignantly confirmed by New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman. "The outcome of the war now under way between the Israelis and Palestinians is vital to the security of every American, and indeed... to all of civilization... because if suicide bombing is allowed to work in Israel, then, like hijacking and airplane bombing, it will be copied and will eventually lead to a bomber strapped with a nuclear device threatening entire nations...The whole world," Friedman concludes, "must see this Palestinian suicide strategy defeated."

Canada and the other democracies have a special role to play in standing at Israel's side to defeat this suicide strategy. It is delusional and dangerous folly to think otherwise. It is sheer hypocrisy to act otherwise.

That is why the sight of the so-called peace activists and the CNN reporter rushing to join Yasser Arafat inside his besieged Ramallah enclave last Sunday was also obscene. It was an example of breathtakingly inverted morality, of surrealistic, sinister theatre. They were being either wilfully blind, recklessly helpful or actively complicit in raising the tide of bloodlust washing the organizations bent on striking at the Jewish state.

In a few days, Jews around the world will be marking perhaps the most perverse of all obscenities in human history: Yom Hashoah.

But along with Shoah, we will also be marking Gvurah.

Only Gvurah – strength, commitment, bravery and determination, in words, thoughts and deeds from all peace-loving, democratic peoples around the world, will staunch and ultimately defeat that rising red tide of bloodlust and hatred.

Saudi plan is a ploy

The proposal by Crown Prince Abdullah is not a plan but a ploy. It is aimed at turning the focus from Saudi Arabia so that it is not confronted for its funding of terrorist groups carrying out their murderous attacks on Israeli civilians. Clearly, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat is incapable of reining in the suicide bombers who, for years, have been indoctrinated with a visceral hate for all Israelis and Jews. When and if enlightened leadership within the PA takes control and eradicates Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, meaningful discussions towards peace can be initiated.

Eventually, with the end of Palestinian terrorism, Israel will concede east Jerusalem and the Gaza Strip. But Israel will never retreat to the pre-1967 borders on the West Bank, leaving it with only 10 miles of land to the Mediterranean Sea. With the hatred toward Jews instilled in Palestinians in schoolrooms and in speeches, it would be suicidal for Israel to withdraw entirely from the West Bank.

Meanwhile, as soon as there is talk of territorial concessions, the Palestinian side raises the issue of the return of Palestinians to Israel proper. Not once has an Arab leader ever suggested compensation for the Jews driven from Arab lands upon the creation of the State of Israel. I do not think compensation for Jews was on the agenda when the Arab League met in Lebanon.

Gov't. should not support propaganda

On a recent trip to Ottawa, I saw a Museum of Civilization exhibit that depicted art of Canadians of Arab descent. The show was spread over various rooms, with some very interesting displays.

Just beyond the exhibit was a room set up with several TV monitors playing different programs with anti-Israel and anti-Zionist propaganda. Adults and children sat and watched this disinformation. I found the distortion and deception most painful to see and hear.

This Museum of Civilization is supported by Canadians and should not be a forum for any political propaganda. I urge you to write your local member of Parliament with the request that this type of tax-supported exhibition be removed. There is enough anti-Israel slant in the media without the government of Canada adding to this deception.

Court order not a compromise

I was disappointed by Rabbi Gunther Plaut's characterization of the Israeli Supreme Court's decision requiring the registration of Reform and Conservative converts as a "compromise" ("An Important Decision," CJN, March 21). It is nothing of the sort. It only inflames passions on either side of an unnecessary debate, at a time when Israel is fighting for its survival.

A real compromise was worked out by the Ne'eman Commission and it has been implemented with the establishment of the new Joint Conversion Institute (Orthodox, Conservative and Reform). Thousands of people are currently studying to convert, over 100 have already been converted and many more are about to be. This decision undermines the institute, which despite being criticized and denounced by members of all denominations, is growing.

I agree with Rabbi Plaut that "one is either Jewish or one is not." How can a decision (or future decisions) of a largely self-appointed, liberal, secular activist court ever persuade or force all Jews to recognize Reform or Conservative converts? No legal order by that court will ever change the minds and practices of halachic Jews. Rather, graduates/converts of the Joint Conversion Institute are being recognized as Jews without fanfare. I believe that for the sake of the unity of the Jewish people, Rabbi Plaut should promote true compromise, not court orders.

Looking for dream men, too

I empathize with Darcie Richler in her search for nice, single Jewish men in Toronto ("Where are the nice, single, Jewish men?" CJN, March 14). I find myself in the company of a group of wonderful, intelligent women in their 40s and 50s who are asking the same question. Keep looking, Darcie, and when you find your "dream men," will you please ask them, for us, whether any of their fathers are available?

Cancellation deplorable

The cancellation of the Israel portion of the March of the Living trip is deplorable. While most Jewish organizations are promoting and encouraging family vacations and solidarity missions to Israel, the March of the Living is making a damaging statement by discouraging travel to the Jewish State. An organization whose main purpose is to connect Jewish youth with their Judaism is sending these young participants the message that in times of trouble, it is acceptable to abandon Israel and our Jewish brethren who live there. This message negates the organization's intended goals.

As a past participant, I know that the contrast between Poland and Israel, despair and hope and past and future is a lasting message of the trip. By attempting to conduct the trip without the Israel element, the organizers are depriving participants of the opportunity to witness Judaism thrive in Israel after they've seen the remnants of its demise in Poland.

To the soldiers and officers of the IDF:

Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz

For over a year and a half, the State of Israel has been subjected to a terrorist offensive, initiated by the Palestinian Authority. This terrorist offensive aims at killing innocent civilians indiscriminately in order to achieve political goals.

We cannot accept terror and violence. We have no choice but to fulfil the basic obligation which every state must fulfil for its citizens: to ensure their right to live in peace and security.

Therefore, in the very midst of the holiday of Passover, the Israel Defence Forces, acting upon the decision of the government of Israel, has undertaken Operation Defensive Shield, whose objective is to strike at the terrorist infrastructure in order to protect the citizens of Israel.

You, the enlisted personnel and officers of the Israel Defence Forces, together with the Israel Police, Border Police and General Security Service, are operating to arrest wanted terrorists, strike at the perpetrators of terrorist attacks and those who dispatch them, and to uncover terrorist weapons and the workshops that produce them.

Our war is not directed against the Palestinian people. We are fighting against terror and its perpetrators. We shall wage this war with determination and wisdom, while respecting the values of the Israel Defence Forces and its moral code. We shall respect human dignity adamantly.We shall not harm civilians and the innocent, because this is the IDF's unique quality and the source of its strength in the protracted struggle that awaits us.

Reserve officers and enlisted personnel of the Israel Defence Forces, the nature of this type of warfare is complex and demanding. The mission at hand has placed a heavy burden upon the units, officers and enlisted personnel of the regular component of the IDF. It was therefore decided to call up reserve units for this mission.

The spirit of volunteerism and the number of those who have reported for duty are praiseworthy and bring us all honour and security. This response bears unequivocal testimony to the strength and unity of Israeli society.

Since its inception, the State of Israel has had to fight a continuous war for its existence, struggling for the right of its citizens to live in peace and security.

The Israeli people and their armed forces stood firm in the face of years of difficult trials and tribulations. We have known wars, painful attacks and crises, but we always stood fast and overcame them.

So will it be in this struggle, which will be long, difficult and fateful: a struggle against a relentless enemy who does not shrink from using any and all means at its disposal to harm the innocent.

Regular and reserve officers and enlisted personnel of the Israel Defence Forces, the people of Israel entrust their security into your hands; and into the hands of your comrades in the other security forces of our nation.

Know that we are undertaking this operation in order to protect our homes, to protect our rights and those of our parents, brothers, sisters and children to live in our land in peace and security.

Arafat pursues the Lebanon scenario

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Have we reached the peak of Palestinian terrorism against Israeli civilians?

The answer is a resounding no.

The Palestine Liberation Organization showed the extreme levels it can reach during the civil war in Lebanon when its terror actions included massacres that destroyed Beirut and Lebanon.

Some of the Palestinian players at that time – Yasser Arafat first and foremost among them – are playing a key role in the attacks being waged against Israel today. Arafat and his aides have a tendency to forget that the bloodletting and destruction in Lebanon ended only after he and his army were expelled from Lebanon by Israel and the Syrians.

The assessment in Israel is that Arafat hopes to repeat the Lebanon scenario, and not only in terms of a repetition in the territories of the relatively recent Israeli withdrawal in the face of Hezbollah terrorism. He also wants to repeat earlier stages, when he and his people made daily life in Lebanon intolerable. At that time, too, Arafat was adept at declaring endless "ceasefires" and making it appear he was trying to calm the situation.

Arafat is trying a repeat performance now, and it is one the Israeli government and the military have been unable to prevent. It is clear that Israeli deterrence against Palestinian suicide attackers is deteriorating and that Israel is unable to extract a minimum "price" for the murder of its citizens.

Many experts are pondering whether or not to expel Arafat, and it has not yet been decided whether this would be better than imprisoning him in the territories. But it should be noted that Hamas leaders, from Sheikh Ahmed Yassin down, act freely and take responsibility for attacks.

After the suicide attack at the Park Hotel in Netanya on the first night of Passover, the issue is not a ceasefire or U.S. envoy Anthony Zinni's mission, which has been rendered irrelevant, at least for the time being.

The issue now is what shape and form the Israeli military reaction will take. It can be expected that the Israeli response will be raised a notch, if not more. The issue, expressed in government discussions, is whether the next Israeli action will be similar to the Israel Defence Forces' attack two weeks ago, or whether there will be something different about it. Intensifying the response by a notch can express itself in several ways.

The IDF could seize Palestinian targets for a longer period of time – a move that would certainly impose greater suffering on Palestinian civilians. However, decision-makers must also take into consideration the increasing evidence that there is a majority among the Palestinian population today who support suicide terror attacks.

There is a tremendous sense of failure following the attack at the Park Hotel, which in addition to its symbolism on Passover eve, also underscores that despite many promises, nothing has actually been done to seal the border. Terrorists on their way to carrying out attacks in Jerusalem, Netanya and elsewhere do so virtually undeterred.

The question to which Israeli decision-makers have no answer is what is left for Israel to do that it has not already done to prevent terror actions. In addition to military action, which reached its peak with the IDF's entry into seven refugee camps and movement into Palestinian towns such as Ramallah and Qalqilya, Israel has also accepted the Tenet plan, the Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire and security plan proposed by CIA director George Tenet that took effect on June 13, 2001; and the mediation suggestions in the plan proposed by the fact-finding committee headed by George Mitchell, April 30, 2001. Israel has also expressed a willingness to negotiate the more recent Saudi peace initiative.

The sense of deep frustration felt by Israelis was expressed by Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, who said during one meeting with army officers: "A war has been declared on Israel and one has to respond to it as such."

Although he did not say who had made the declaration, he clearly meant the Palestinian leader. This constitutes a change in Ben-Eliezer's stance. He has previously been a main proponent of restraint. But this time, he was one of the main sabre rattlers.

Sometimes the facts are dismal

It is not surprising that these days I am asked, time and time again, what I think of the situation in Israel. When will the intifadah stop, if ever? Will the news from the Middle East always tell us of suicide bombings and other abominations, followed by Israel retaliating (and, of course, being criticized heavily for it). Where in all of this are the signs of the possibilities for peace? They seem to arise from time to time, but, essentially, they have been absent for a long while.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There is a fundamental difference in the views that the two sides bring to the basic issue. Israel has one major objective: it wants to be left alone and live its life like most other nations on earth. But all too many Arabs do not want to leave it alone. The majority opinion among the Arabs seems to be that permanent peace can come only when Israel disappears.

It has been my unpleasant opportunity to read what Arab children are being taught about Israel, and about Jews in general. Hitler would be proud to read this garbage, which is as strong and unmitigated in its anti-Semitism as the Nazis ever were. This hatred is taught to children from their earliest days, and has gone far beyond anti-Israel propaganda. Imams in some of the mosques have preached that when one meets a Jew, one should kill him. As I said, Hitler would have stood up in the audience and applauded loudly.

I do not believe that there will be peace between Israel and the Arabs until Arab children are no longer being brought up to hate Jews in general, and Israel in particular. How can we even begin to imagine a mother who is proud when her child blows himself or herself up in order to kill Jews? One woman was quoted as saying that she wished she had more children to offer on the altar of martyrdom.

My readers will rightfully ask whether I am implying that peace negotiations are useless in view of the basic unwillingness of so many Palestinians and their allies to acknowledge Israel's right to its land. This is where my optimism creeps in: I will always give peace a chance, even though my mind does not support the rationale of the effort. But miracles do happen, even though I do not believe that I will live to see any sign of lasting peace – I just hope that when it finally comes to pass, my children and grandchildren may be around to rejoice.

Meanwhile, however, I believe that Israel will have to defend its right to exist for many decades to come.

These we remember

I learned about the Holocaust in 1945. I was five. My parents didn't necessarily want me to learn about it this way, but when they went to a nearby church to see film footage brought home by a returning soldier, they took me along. There on screen were flickering images of piles of bodies, of tattooed arms, of survivors whose shaven heads and sunken cheeks made their eyes look huge. I didn't get an explanation from my parents of what I had seen.

But I remembered.

In 1961, as an undergraduate, I was a research intern in the Penn State history department. I was assigned the task of reading the entire English transcripts of the Nuremberg trials. I spent my summer in the dusty library stacks reading descriptions of things that cannot be described.

And I remembered.

In 1975, I began working with a unique group of people dedicated to teaching the Holocaust to high school students in the public school system. The Standing Committee on the Holocaust has reached thousands of high school students in British Columbia and is a model many other Canadian communities have followed. In the past year, two of its wonderful members have died and I want to remember them.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Klara was born in Gonc, a small town in Hungary near the Czech border, in 1928. She was a precocious child who entered school at four and planned to be a pediatrician. She started high school in Budapest but returned home when the war began. Her parents, brother and sister were killed and Klara was taken as a young teen to Auschwitz-Birkenau. She would have died with her family, but she was chosen for slave labour in a munitions factory because, as she often recounted to high school students, "I had such small hands."

She was liberated in Bergen-Belsen in April 1945, sick with fever and starving. "I woke up in a field," she told me " and all around me were dead bodies." Desperate to see if any fragments of her family and her former life had survived, she returned to Hungary rather than leave on a children's transport to America. Trapped after Hungary fell to the Communists, she took whatever work she found, her dream of becoming a doctor gone.

Then Klara met and married a young Jewish lawyer, Ernie. They had one daughter, Cathy, who was a baby when they fled in 1956 and came to Vancouver, where Klara taught herself English and Ernie became a high school Latin teacher ("the benefits of a classical education," he would joke.)

Klara was one of the survivors who began to tell her story for students. Girls especially would gravitate to her, always fascinated by those small hands that saved her life. Klara was a gentle woman who taught thousands to remember.

Another life to cherish: Sophie was born in 1928 in eastern Poland. She attended school in Lvov and became a pharmacist. Sophie survived by posing as a Catholic, sheltered by Polish friends. One day she arrived at the house where her husband was hiding and discovered he had been shot. Unable to reveal her grief, she walked back to the car that had brought her and resumed her charade. After the war, she married Isaac Waldman and moved to Canada. Unable to resume her former career, she retrained as a medical technician, eventually becoming head of her department.

Sophie too had a story, but she taught her message differently. She was instrumental in founding the Warsaw Ghetto Memorial Committee, one of the first in Canada. She contributed to the arts and music in her new city and founded and supported the Isaac Waldman Jewish Library in Isaac's memory. And she did more.

In the Jewish community, she created a committee that rescued and resettled Vietnamese boat people. "After all," she said more than once, "we were the original boat people. Nobody wanted us. We have to make sure that doesn't happen again."

Sophie was also a vital member of the Holocaust Committee, although she never told her own story in public. Yet, through her establishment of a chair of Holocaust studies at the University of British Columbia, she will teach thousands to remember.

It has been a long time since I saw that silent film in 1945. And with all the others whose lives have been touched by Klara and Sophie, I won't forget.

Shul shopping

The small, humble Conservative shul where I grew up, will be joining two other north end Winnipeg shuls in a merger necessitated by demographics.

If all goes according to plan, Beth Israel, Rosh Pina Congregation and Bnay Abraham Synagogue will join together in time for the High Holy Days in the building that currently houses Rosh Pina. The merged shul will function under a new name and a new board that will initially represent the three existing shuls equally.

Stuart Shaven in Winnipeg

The amalgamation talks seem to be proceeding smoothly and the process appears to be very transparent. I confess I haven't been that interested in getting involved politically, nor have I attended the information meetings. Maybe it's because I just accept the merger as inevitable and trust the leadership; or it's maybe because I don't want to face the fact that my shul is going to disappear.

While there is still a substantial Jewish population in Winnipeg's north end, the trend of families moving to the south end continues. Among other reasons, people move to be closer to the outstanding Asper Jewish Community Campus and, presumably, to the equator. (Hey, in a prairie climate, every inch closer to warmth counts!)

The north end population can no longer sustain five small Orthodox congregations and three larger Conservative synagogues. (Technically, Bnay Abraham is not affiliated with the Conservative movement, but microphones are used and there is mixed seating.)

My wife and I are originally north enders, but we settled south when we got married. Still, we cross town to attend Beth Israel, mostly because of me. My parents were very active around the time of the shul's launch. My mother became president of the sisterhood; my father served as president of the affiliated seniors home and attended shul regularly.

My bar mitzvah was at Beth Israel. So were my dad's funeral, my oif ruf and my daughter's baby naming. Last Yom Kippur, my infant son slept in my arms for the entire Kol Nidrei service there. My daughter participates weekly in the Tots Shabbat program and helps to lead the congregation in Adon Olam (technically that's not true; the older kids lead the congregation while my daughter runs around on the bimah and then announces that she has to pee).

It's hard to break a bond with a shul when so much of your personal Jewish history is contained within its walls. So, while I know the merger is right and am confident that it will proceed as smoothly as possible, my wife and I find ourselves on the threshold of an opportunity. The lead proponents of the merger have made it abundantly clear that the new shul will be a new shul. While the heritage of the three partners will be honoured, the new shul will be a new entity.

For us, that means we don't need to automatically sign on to the membership list. It won't be Beth Israel; it won't pretend to be. I don't feel obligated or pressured (yet). So, my wife and I are planning to shul shop.

Now, eastern readers should note that shul shopping in Winnipeg, as opposed to Toronto, is like buying your groceries from a vending machine instead of at Loblaws. That means we likely won't find an exact ideological and social match.

Last Shabbat, we went to the city's main Orthodox shul (which also hosts the local Aish HaTorah office). It was fine, despite our dislike of the mechitzah. We'll probably go again, though. We are not particularly observant, but I like a traditional service and an environment where everyone sings. We also want to try the city's largest Conservative shul. I'm curious about the Reform temple in town and we'll certainly give the new shul a close look, too.

For us, a shul's affiliation and facility are less important than the environment and the energy. We're looking for a shul that feels like a community. We want a place where people sing; where there are Shabbat morning programs for kids; where we can socialize easily; where there's a sense of joy, ease, spirituality and commonality.

I guess we want Beth Israel. And soon we won't have it. Let the shopping begin.

The Kirshner File

The legacy of the legendary Rothschilds lives on

The Rothschilds are synonymous with unsurpassed wealth and influence. Rising from the depths of Frankfurt's ghetto and prospering mightily during the 18th and 19th centuries, they amassed a fortune that made them into the richest family of modern times.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Financiers to kings and countries, the interests of the legendary Rothschild clan included a pan-European railway network, a Russian lake of oil and an international mining empire turning on African gold and diamonds, Burmese rubies and Spanish mercury.

Wars, insurrections, revolutions and political and financial crises threatened the stability of their holdings, but by World War I theirs was the biggest bank in the world.

Niall Ferguson, an Oxford University scholar, deftly tells the intriguing story of this accomplished Jewish family in The House of Rothschild: The World's Banker 1849-1999 (Penguin Books Canada). Like volume one, The House of Rothschild: Money's Prophets 1798-1848, it is based on a motherlode of rich archival material culled from many sources.

In volume 2, Ferguson concentrates on the nitty-gritty of their formidable acquisitive powers, examining the particular circumstances that catapulted them to fame. Such details, while important in charting their evolution and trajectory as bankers, are not exactly the compelling stuff of drama. But fortunately, The House of Rothschild is more than a treatise on the dismal science of economics, and readers will recognize this as they delve into its juicier parts.

Make no mistake. The French Revolution, which demolished the walls of ghettos throughout Europe, enabled the Rothschilds to begin their phenomenal ascent. Prior to 1789, the patriarch of the family, Mayer Amschel, was hobbled by a web of discriminatory legislation. No matter how hard he worked, first as a coin dealer and then as a bill broker and merchant banker, there were strict limits as to what he could achieve.

Once the transcendent ideals of liberty and equality washed over southern Germany and Frankfurt's Judengasse was opened, Mayer Amschel was free at last to exercise his unusual talents.

With Europe torn by revolutionary wars instigated by Napoleon, and with the borrowing needs of the combatant states escalating, the Rothschilds stepped into the breach. Not intimidated by the breakdown of traditional patterns of trade and banking, risk takers like Mayer Amschel and his son, Nathan, flourished.

As Ferguson tells it, they gambled everything for the sake of government commissions, interest payments and speculative gains from exchange rates and bond yield fluctuations.

During the 1820s, the Rothschilds hitched their wagon to status quo conservative forces resisting revolutionary impulses. This enabled Austria, Prussia, Russia and the restored Bourbon dynasty in France to issue bonds at rates of interest only Britain and Holland had previously been able to enjoy, and thus "police" Europe.

In Ferguson's estimation, the Rothschilds' most lasting contribution to Europe's economy was the creation of a truly international bond market. But bonds were just a small segment of their business. Great believers in diversification, they discounted commercial bills, acted as bullion brokers, dealt in foreign exchange and commodity trade, dabbled in insurance, and even offered private banking services to an elite corps of clients.

Being multinationalists from the outset, the Rothschilds – Nathan, Amschel, James, Salomon and Carl – expanded beyond Frankfurt and founded branches in England, France, Austria and Italy. The five houses formed a unique partnership that gave them certain advantages, Ferguson explains at length.

By the mid-1820s, the Rothschilds stood head and shoulders above their nearest rival, Baring Brothers of London. Strangely enough, they underestimated the value of the emerging market in the United States. It was, in Ferguson's estimation, their biggest strategic mistake.

Unlike some other Jewish families of their rank, the Rothschilds remained firmly attached to Judaism and resisted, at least for a while, the temptations of assimilation and conversion. When Nathan's daughter, Hannah Mayer, converted to Christianity to marry the English aristocrat Henry Fitzroy in 1839, she was ostracized. But with the passage of time, interfaith marriages became increasingly common among the Rothschilds.

In 1878, Hannah Rothschild wed Archibald Primrose, a future British foreign minister, and in 1882 Bertha Clara Rothschild married Alexandre Berthier, a descendant of Napoleon's chief of staff. The pattern continues to this day.

Fidelity to their religion was integral to the interest they took in the fate of their "poorer co-religionists." The Rothschilds established charitable institutions and defended the civil and political rights of Jews from Poland and Russia to Italy and Syria.

Lionel de Rothschild, 1858

They also sought to improve the status of Jews in England. In 1856, Lionel de Rothschild was the first professing Jew to sit in the House of Commons, a landmark event that foreshadowed greater acceptance of the Jewish community.

Early converts to Zionism, the Rothschilds began their activities in the Middle East by donating funds to Jewish schools in Jerusalem. Only later, in the 1880s, did they consider the possibility of establishing Jewish colonies in Palestine. The Rothschilds, however, were not helpful to Theodor Herzl, the founder of political Zionism. Walter de Rothschild, though, fought hard for the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which committed England to a "national home for the Jewish people" in Palestine. Nevertheless, some of his assimilationist relatives were less than pleased by his endorsement of Zionism.

According to Ferguson, the Rothschilds' commanding position in the international capital market declined after 1880. Compared with rival banks, they were less profitable and grew less rapidly. Yet N.M. Rothschild & Sons was still the largest private bank in Britain when World War I broke out.

He ascribes their decline to several factors. The war, which wrecked the world in which they had thrived, severed what was left of the co-operation between the various branches of the Rothschilds, and shattered their ties to German banks. The overseas trade they depended on was suddenly disrupted, and the monetary system around which their enterprises revolved ceased to exist. Finally, the staggering costs of the war accelerated the process whereby the European tax systems became more progressive.

The Nazi takeover of Germany and Austria in 1933 and 1938 were further setbacks for the Rothschilds, two of whose members were murdered during the Holocaust.

Today, N.M. Rothschild & Sons, based in England, occupies what Ferguson describes as "a relatively small niche" in the financial services business, dwarfed by giants like Lloyds and Citigroup.

Yet the Rothschilds, with offices in such countries as Canada, Argentina, Japan, Brazil, Russia, South Africa and Poland, remain players of no small importance.

Interestingly enough, their most ambitious project after World War II was in Newfoundland, where they helped develop its tremendous natural resources.

The Rothschilds are no longer behemoths, but their legacy lives on.

Recalling the Rebbe's achievements...

By J. IMMANUEL SCHOCHET

Feature

The pre-eminent Jewish religious leader of the second half of the 20th century was undoubtedly Rabbi Menachem M. Schneerson, the late Lubavitcher Rebbe. Indeed, it is not presumptuous to argue that few personalities in the history of the Diaspora match the impact he had upon the Jewish people and the world. Certainly, then, it is appropriate to reflect upon his contribution as we mark the centenary of his birth.

Our people, from the very beginning, have been blessed with numerous great and extraordinary individuals, each of whom excelled in some special way. The genius of some was in unusual scholarship, with others making immortal literary contributions. Some were inspiring saints and mentors, others exemplified remarkable leadership and guidance, communally and nationally, preserving Jewish identity and continuity. The Lubavitcher Rebbe was unique in that he possessed all these qualities like few others before him.

Close to 300 texts of the Rebbe's literary legacy have been published to date. These include, in an ongoing project called Igrot Kodesh, 25 volumes that contain more than 9,500 selected letters of public interest. So far, only those up to 1968 have been published. The letters include profound scholarly exchanges in all areas of Torah-scholarship with many of the greatest scholars of his time; notes on hundreds of books sent to him by their authors; exchanges with political and communal leaders in Israel and throughout the world; letters of guidance; and comments and insights on every conceivable subject (ranging from theological issues, synthesis of Torah, philosophy and science, education, outreach work and perennial problems of general and individual nature especially pertaining to modern life).

Dozens of other volumes offer original and insightful commentaries on Bible, Talmud, Maimonides, the Shulchan Aruch, Halachic responsa, kabbalistic and Chassidic texts, as well as many treatises on a number of philosophical and mystical issues. There is not a single area of Jewish scholarship or interest that is not covered and enlightened by the Rebbe's phenomenal knowledge. The literary output alone suffices to establish the Rebbe's place in the glorious chain of immortal luminaries. It is without equal not only in the 20th century, but in centuries before.

Rabbi Schneerson

To the public at large, however, the Rebbe is better known as a revolutionary activist. He literally changed the face of the Jewish world. He did not stop at rebuilding the Chassidic community from the ashes of the Holocaust and providing them with the leadership they needed. His concern was for all Jews, wherever they may be, and he implanted that concern and sense of responsibility in his followers. Thus he founded an outreach-program that spans the whole world. His emissaries were sent to places near and far, from Alaska to Argentina, from Turkey to China and Japan, from Australia to North and South Africa.

Chabad centres have been established in locations of which only the Rebbe seemed to know that Jews existed there and were in dire need to be brought back to their roots. India, Nepal, Singapore, Thailand, post-stamp nations in the Americas or outlying towns in nearly all 50 U.S. states, are just some of the exotic places in which nearly 3,000 young married couples have settled to disseminate the light of Judaism, disregarding distance from family and material and religious hardships that are difficult to imagine – the least of which is the need to import all kosher products.

Perhaps the Rebbe's most extraordinary quality was his prophetic vision. With every project he undertook he was ahead of his times. His efforts were often greeted with condescension or skepticism, frequently dismissed as unrealistic dreams, and even criticized by those who argued that it is more important to concentrate on self-defence by building fortified ghettos of our own.

The Rebbe, however, was singular in his uncanny perception of future developments. His wider and deeper wisdom found the potential for good even in phenomena that would seem to stand in his way. For example, he recognized hidden potential in the fervour of the hippie movement of the '60s, and he tapped and harnessed this energy with the founding of Chabad Houses on dozens of campuses, resulting in unimaginable numbers of baalei tshuvah who themselves became activists for yiddishkeit.

Especially noteworthy in this context are the Rebbe's efforts in the former Soviet Union. Ever since the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, Lubavitch was at the forefront, mostly alone, of keeping the embers of Judaism alive in those dark days. Underground religious schools, synagogues, mikvahs, shechitah, circumcisions – all forbidden, with the most dire consequences for breaking the law – were maintained by a corps of dedicated Chassidim for whom orders of the Rebbe meant more than the threats of the Kremlin and the NKVD. Many chassidim, unfortunately, paid the ultimate price, but were quickly replaced by others.

It is an understatement to say that the Jewish consciousness surviving among Soviet Jewry once the walls of the gulags came tumbling down, was due largely to the self-sacrificing efforts of the Rebbe and his chassidim.

Little wonder that in the post-Soviet era, it is again Chabad Lubavitch, guided by the Rebbe's instructions and inspiration, that remains at the forefront of the religious rehabilitation of Russian Jewry. Chabad centres, schools, clubs and camps dot the republics of the former empire.

Just as close to the Rebbe's heart were the Jews of Israel. There are more Chabad centres there than anywhere else in the world. The Rebbe's concern with the people in Israel was not limited to the religious sphere. He worried day and night about their security and welfare. Few people on earth, including local political and social leadership, had so uncanny a grasp of the local needs and problems. Little wonder that members of the Knesset of all political parties, several presidents and prime ministers, military and security chiefs of the State of Israel, were in frequent contact with the Rebbe.

Unforgettable moments include the critical weeks preceding the Six Day War, when the Rebbe was the only one forbidding any of his followers, including foreign students studying in Israel, to leave the country. In word and writing he encouraged the population, promising a speedy and unequivocal victory.

The Rebbe's views were often regarded as controversial, especially his uncompromising position on Israel's security and religious identity crises. As with everything else, his vision was not limited to "here and now" quick solutions but he foresaw future consequences. Many of his former critics, on the right and on the left, now concede their profound regret for not appreciating and following his advice.

Eight years have passed since the Rebbe's passing, during which time Chabad institutions have nearly doubled. The centenary of his birth is certainly a time to reflect on the extraordinary life and contributions of the Rebbe.

There is not a single Jewish movement and individual today who, in some way or another, conscious or unconscious, has not been impacted by the Rebbe's work and legacy. Unlike others, he did not seek followers, but to mould self-sufficient leaders imbued with an awareness of their own potential, a sense of their communal responsibilities and the will to act upon them.

No doubt, though, the Rebbe's message – even now, in these difficult times – is to repeat what he continuously demanded and practised throughout his lifetime: "The most important thing is action! Every action is better than a thousand sighs, and no action for a good purpose has ever been done in vain.

"We ourselves do not count. It is our task, our sacred mission, that matters. And if we but want to carry it on, our goal will not remain unachieved. We have to will to do what God demands of us, and in that will all our weaknesses and insufficiencies wane and become insignificant."

Oberlander case expected to drag on

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) adjudicator has set May 16 as the date to hear arguments about whether to deport one-time Nazi killing squad member Helmut Oberlander, but there's a good chance Oberlander's legal battle with immigration authorities will continue for years to come.

Shortly after IRB adjudicator Carmen De Carlo set the mid-May date, Oberlander's lawyer, Barbara Jackman, told reporters she will likely seek a court-ordered stay of proceedings of the May appearance date.

Jackman – who was two months late filing legal documents, prompting the adjournment to mid-May – said she has already applied for a judicial review of the cabinet decision to remove her client's citizenship and said that issue should be decided before the deportation hearing commences.

Those hearings and related reviews and appeals could see the case drag on for years, said Ed Morgan, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Before the courts since 1995

Oberlander has been before the courts since 1995, when federal authorities alleged he entered Canada and acquired Canadian citizenship by lying to immigration officials. Two years ago, a Federal Court judge ruled Oberlander had indeed entered Canada by misrepresenting his wartime service with Einsatzkommando 10a, a Nazi killing unit that swept across the southern Soviet Union in the wake of German army forces, murdering Jews and political opponents. Oberlander served as an interpreter with the unit.

Based on the judges' findings, the federal cabinet stripped Oberlander of his citizenship last summer.

Jackman said she planned to argue that federal authorities are engaged in an "abuse of process" against her client, delaying denaturalization proceedings against him for 25 years. Federal officials knew of allegations against Oberlander in 1970 but did not take steps to strip him of citizenship until 1995, when "he became an old man," Jackman said.

She said she plans to argue that despite losing his citizenship, Oberlander is domiciled in Canada and, therefore, cannot be deported.

What's more, she said after the hearing was recessed, "the Jewish community should be horrified" that legal proceedings were launched against her client, who she maintained was a 17-year-old conscript against whom there was no specific evidence of war crimes.

"To deport him after 50 years is politics." Her client was merely caught up in the government's need to show results in its efforts against Nazi war criminals, Jackman said.

Oberlander is one of 17 alleged Nazi war criminals the government is attempting to remove from Canada. The Justice Department's war crimes unit, which prosecutes the cases, alleges the men (some of whom have died) collaborated with, or were members of, Nazi units and they would never have been allowed into the country if they had honestly described their wartime service records.

In a decision released two years ago, Federal Court Judge Andrew MacKay found that Oberlander would not have been admitted to Canada had he been truthful in describing to immigration authorities his service as an interpreter with Einsatzkommando 10a.

In addition to murdering Jews and political opponents, the units participated in vicious anti-partisan warfare, in which captured guerrillas were interrogated and tortured.

MacKay found that important parts of Oberlander's testimony during his trial in Kitchener were not believable and that "his recollections, as revealed in his testimony, are selective."

The judge also found Oberlander's claim that he did not even learn until 1970 the name of the unit in which he served for 1½ years "is not worthy of belief."

He questioned Oberlander's statement denying knowledge of a standing order that every member of a Kommando had to participate in an execution and he doubted Oberlander's claim he did not take part in interrogations.

During anti-partisan activities, MacKay noted, Oberlander was armed with a machine pistol and "the interpreter's role then was to question persons detained, and those without valid explanation for their presence or their activities were in trouble."

Following adjournment of the hearing last week, Morgan, a law professor, speculated Oberlander's case could take a long time to resolve.

"As a law professor, we are getting into complex legal issues. From a Jewish community point of view, it is a frustrating process. It's frustrating because his very complaint was lack of due process."

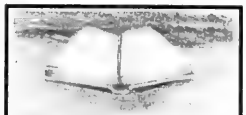
Jewish Life

After 9/11: an inspirational story

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

In the gloomy world since Sept. 11 and the recent intifadah in Israel, we can all use a little inspiration.

A few weeks ago, while visiting my hometown New York with my wife and children, I believe we were tapped on the shoulder from above with a small miracle. I'll let you be the judge.



I must preface my story by telling you about an amazing children's video produced by Chabad called I Am A Chasid. It's a collection of small skits teaching Jewish values and ethics as taught by the Rebbe, of blessed memory. It was produced after the Rebbe's death to let children familiarize themselves and bond with the Rebbe posthumously. My children watch it all the time.

One of the skits is a fictional story about the belief in hashgocho protis – divine providence, a general Jewish belief that is one of the principle doctrines of Chassidism.

In the skit, a young boy, after missing his school bus, runs into his teacher who comforts him and asks the boy to deliver a letter to his friend on the way to school. The young boy has difficulty locating the address. A black New York police officer who happens by notices the lost boy and helps him find the address.

The man who opens the door notices the officer and says, "Now, isn't that hashgocho protis? Aren't you the officer who helped me fix my car yesterday? Wow, I really meant to thank you yesterday and now you come in person to my doorstep. Isn't that incredible?"

The officer asks, "Excuse my ignorance, but what does that Hebrew word hashgocho protis mean?"

The man explains that hashgocho protis is divine providence. It means all that happens in the world is not accidental and that there is a divine plan for everything.

As soon as the officer walks away, he bumps into the director of a nearby day school. "Officer you're just the man I was looking for," says the director. "Our school needs a permit for our upcoming outdoor event." The police officer says with a smile on his face: "Wow isn't that hashgocho protis!" to the surprise of the school director, who nearly faints when he hears him utter the Hebrew words.

Now back to my New York story. It was erev Shabbat and my children insisted we go to Ground Zero in Manhattan to pay our respects and to say a few chapters of Tehillim in memory of those who died. It was getting late, but children have persuasive abilities, so off we went.

Arriving at Ground Zero, we quickly made our way to the observation deck overlooking the site. To our great disappointment we were stopped by a police officer who told us there was a four-hour wait and that we had to get a ticket and line up like everyone else. We tried to explain that we had come especially from Toronto and it was erev Shabbat, but to no avail.

"You see that long line," he said. "They're all coming to Ground Zero from all over the world. I'm very sorry, but we can't make any exceptions."

I knew my children were devastated. We were so close to being there, but there was no way we could wait in line without being late for Shabbat. Then just as the officer finished talking, one of my children asked: "Aren't you the hashgocho protis policeman?" My child had recognized him from the video. There was absolute silence. We were all stunned. We had just experienced a moment of destiny.

The officer broke the silence. He looked at my children and smiled, "Yeah, you saw the video? That's me hashgocho protis," he chuckled. "Hey, you guys are my friends. Come on with me. Let me take you right in!"

Without another word, he whisked us past the line. "Now tell me kids, isn't this hashgocho protis?" he said, winking as he disappeared into the crowd.

I guess HaShem was telling us: "Hang in there children. I am with you. Shabbat is coming and I won't let you down. What may seem to you a long wait might not be so long after all. Even at Ground Zero where such unexplainable tragedy struck, don't lose your faith. Be strong. There is a plan. There is hashgocho protis."

Rabbi Plotkin is spiritual leader and executive director of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

'God bless the people of Israel'

By MICHAEL COREN

Guest Voice

It wasn't always that easy. Growing up as a product of a mixed marriage, that is. My dad is Jewish, my mum has a Jewish father but a Gentile mother.

I suppose I should be a natural candidate for therapy, but actually, I have a strong sense of self and strong beliefs. I am also happy and proud to be a Christian with Jewish ancestry who puts his support quite firmly behind the only democratic and progressive nation in the Middle East – namely, Israel.

In fact, I've always supported the Jewish State, but in the past, I've been less outspoken, more critical. Not now. As a journalist and broadcaster – as a person – I've become tired and angered by the hypocrisy and the double standards.

Take recent events. A terrorist attack on a church in Pakistan leaves innocent people dead, broken and disabled. The newspapers rightly headline the story with words such as "terrorist" and "Islamic extremists."

At almost the same time, a crazed Palestinian runs to a school in Israel and opens fire on any children he can see. One beautiful young girl is shot dead. Her crime? Being a Jew living in Israel. At her funeral, her boyfriend says through his tears that he will visit his love in a dream so that he can hug her one last time.

Yet this time, the newspapers refer not terrorism but to "war," not to Islamic extremists but to "gunmen." The same slaughter of the innocents, but a radically different use of language.

A peace group holds a demonstration in Israel. Many consider the organization to be pro-Palestinian, and one passerby tries to break up the protest. He is stopped by the police. The cops might not be comfortable with the event, but in Israel freedom of speech is a given, as it is in Canada.

Just a few miles away, in Bethlehem, Islamic terror gangs have reduced the Christian population of the city to a fraction of what it was while under Israeli control. They find two men they claim are collaborators, friends of Israel. The men are beaten, tortured and murdered. Their bodies are dragged through the streets, one of them hung up in front of the spot many Christians claim to be the birthplace of Jesus.

There was very little media coverage of either event, and no comparison of the way the two peoples treat their opponents.

Let me make one thing abundantly clear. It is not because I have a Jewish father that I support Israel. It is because I have a father who taught me the difference between right and wrong, good and bad. God bless him for that, and God bless the land and people of Israel.

Jewish Life

Into the heart of Mussar philosophy

Climbing Jacob's Ladder: One Man's Journey to Rediscover a Jewish Spiritual Tradition* by Alan Morinis: Random House, 2002.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Born and reared in Toronto, in a secular, left-wing Jewish environment, Alan Morinis completed his doctorate at Oxford University, which he attended on a Rhodes Scholarship.

His dissertation focused on Hindu pilgrimage. In search of further enlightenment he practised Yoga in India and sought out the Dalai Lama for serious study. But after a series of business failures and nagging ethical concerns, he turned to his Jewish roots.

He writes, "As a young seeker, I had been drawn to the light of Eastern religions, but even in those years there was always something in me that didn't quite fit, some hidden threshold I couldn't quite cross. Many of my friends took swami names or shaved their heads or donned robes, but I never did, I think because really deep down, I knew that just wasn't me. Despite those years at Oxford and all those months of Buddhist meditation and Hindu pilgrimages, when life whipped me around and stripped me bare and make me look myself right in the eye, I was still the little Jewish kid from the suburbs of Toronto."

Searching Judaism for answers to his growing need for a new pattern of life and observance, he happened upon the teachings of Mussar. He was captivated by a religious movement that stressed proper ethical behaviour as a path to spiritual fulfilment. The Mussar movement was founded in the mid-19th century by a Lithuanian rabbi named Israel Salanter. It is both a call to ethical behaviour as well as a program of personal introspective and transformative practices that lead, step by step, along the path of purification and change.

Rabbi Salanter was a powerful and courageous personality. Once, during a cholera epidemic in Kovno, he insisted that the community synagogue be temporarily used as a hospital and a place for the poor and needy. Some objected. During a sermon he pointed at the president of the congregation and cried out, "You'll live to answer to the Lord for the suffering of the poor."

On another occasion, because of the severity of the cholera epidemic, he become convinced, on the advice of physicians, to dispense with fasting on Yom Kippur. When other rabbis were reluctant to follow his lead, he solemnly produced wine and cake in the synagogue and ate and drank.

Louis Ginsberg has written, "One can hardly imagine what moral courage that action required for a man whose obedience to the Torah was his highest duty."

After diligent search, Morinis found a wise and understanding Mussar teacher, the head of a yeshiva, with whom he studied, on and off, for three years.

Climbing Jacob's Ladder is the story of the author's journey into the heart of Mussar philosophy. He attempts to distil its lessons in 10 chapters, each followed by a simple exercise to help the reader explore its teachings in daily life.

Clearly written and thought provoking, this book is both an engaging memoir and an introduction to the little-known heritage of Mussar, which teaches that by changing one's self, one can change the world.

Yom Hashoah & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This year on April 9, people will pause to remember the heroism of the millions of Jews who perished in the Holocaust. The Internet is an excellent source of thought-provoking materials that can help you with your observance of Yom Hashoah.

The decision to commemorate Yom Hashoah on the 27th day of Nissan was the result of a lot of negotiation soon after the State of Israel was established. According to about.com, this time of year was selected in order to coincide with the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. But since the uprising began on the first night of Passover in 1943, it was decided that Yom Hashoah would fall in late Nissan, after Passover but within the time span of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. "On April 12, 1951, the Knesset proclaimed Yom Hashoah U'Mered HaGetaot [Holocaust and Ghetto Revolt Remembrance Day] to be the 27th of Nissan. The name later became known as Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah (Devastation and Heroism Day), and even later, was simplified to Yom Hashoah." [http://history1900s.about.com/library/holocaust/aa042398.htm]

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem, has prepared some activities for Yom Hashoah. This year's theme is Their Last Voice: Letters and Testimonials from Jews in the Holocaust. You can read the last testament of people who perished in the Shoah. You can also commemorate Yom Hashoah by downloading and filling out pages of testimony to document the people who were murdered during the war. While on the site, you can also visit a fascinating page that surveys which countries and cities around the world have proclaimed official Holocaust memorial days [http://www.yad-vashem.org.il/remembrance/rememberance_day/home_remembrance_day.html].

Virtual Jerusalem looks at how to observe the day and includes English translations of the powerful Yizkor and K'El Maleh Rachamim prayers that were prepared to commemorate those who perished [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/yomhashoa/prayer.htm]. And the United States Holocaust Memorial offers background about the Shoah, and several suggestions for people who would like to organize remembrance ceremonies [http://www.ushmm.org/remembrance/organizeaday/].

You can find many other superb resources about the Shoah on the Internet. I recommend the award-winning Nizkor Project which was created by Canada's Ken McVay [http://www.bonder.com/march.html], Amcha, Israel's Centre for Holocaust Survivors and the Second Generation [http://www.amcha.org/] and Remember.org, a "cybrary" of the Holocaust [http://www.remember.org/].

Many Yom Hashoah sites focus on how new generations are coming to terms with the horrors of the Holocaust. At the Teen-to-Teen Web site, you can read some teenagers' thoughts after they visited Holocaust museums and met survivors of the Shoah. Here is how Nathan Lyons described meeting Auschwitz survivor Noah Klieger. "It was amazing, but he was just a person. Except that when I went over his story and realised that this same body, same eyes had stumbled across corpses of dead Jews and seen shootings and hangings; for him they were not photos in a book or plain words or our naive approximations of events... they were his life." [http://www.ttt.org.il/may99/index1.htm]

Every year, thousands of young people travel to Poland to visit the death camps. Even if you will never be part of a March of the Living, it is worth a look at their Web site to see how teenagers prepare for the emotions and the horrors that await them. The Web site is part history lesson and part explanation of the unexplainable [http://www.motl.org/].

Many sites not only ask different questions about past, they also ask challenging questions about the future of Holocaust observances. Prof. David Roskies and Chancellor Ismar Schorsch of the Jewish Theological Seminary debate the need for ritual commemoration and ask "How Much Holocaust is too Much?" [http://learn.jtsa.edu/yomhashoah/].

And half a century after the end of the Shoah, Rabbi Eliezer Shore asks: "How long the burden of hatred?" He remembers that "in our home, German was synonymous with Nazi. We did not buy German products, we had no German acquaintances. Nor were we alone in our feelings. All our Jewish neighbours felt this way...." [http://www.ou.org/pardes/pdf/shoah.pdf] Those lines are taken from When Should we Stop Hating? a thought-provoking Yom Hashoah booklet created by the Orthodox Union's Pardes Institute.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt taught thousands

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rabbi Jacob Mendel Kirshenblatt, a spiritual leader and longtime teacher who taught thousands of bar and bat mitzvah students, died in Toronto on March 6. He was 98.

Obituary

Rabbi Kirshenblatt was honoured in February by Beth Sholom Synagogue and Congregation Beth Haminyan at a tribute dinner attended by many of his former students.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt

Leslie Train, who studied for his bar mitzvah with Rabbi Kirshenblatt and continued his studies and friendship with his mentor, said the rabbi "was an institution unto himself. He was extremely versatile and flexible in the way he handled Judaism."

Train said Rabbi Kirshenblatt was comfortable whether he was with the ultra-Orthodox or in a small community where people didn't have much of a Jewish background.

"He brought people closer to Torah, and that is what he did all of his life. And he always received everyone with a friendly face."

Rabbi Kirshenblatt was born in Driltsh, Poland and arrived in Canada in 1929 from Palestine.

He studied with the world renowned Chofetz Chaim at the Radun Yeshiva in Poland and traveled to Palestine in 1927. He continued his studies in Petach Tikvah and received smichah in 1929 at age 26.

In Canada, he served as a pulpit rabbi, teacher, mohel and shochet in Glace Bay, N.S., and also served as spiritual leader in Ontario in Welland, Peterborough and Toronto.

While volunteering as a chaplain with Allied troops stationed in Nova Scotia during World War II, he met Rabbi David Monson, with whom he later founded Beth Sholom Synagogue.

He taught in Beth Sholom's school and served as the synagogue's assistant rabbi and Torah reader. He retired in 1972 and was given an honorary appointment as assistant rabbi emeritus.

He continued teaching bar and bat mitzvah students and provided chaplaincy services at Queen Elizabeth Hospital (now part of the Toronto Rehabilitation Institute).

He also had the distinction of blowing the shofar on the High Holy Days from the time he was 13 years old.

A humble man with a keen sense of humour, Rabbi Kirshenblatt agreed to the tribute event in February, provided the evening would raise funds for the Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma, part of the Albert and Temmy Latner Institute at Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Kirshenblatt is survived by his daughter Sheila. His wife Annie and daughters Shoshana Philipp and Renee Kirshenblatt predeceased him.

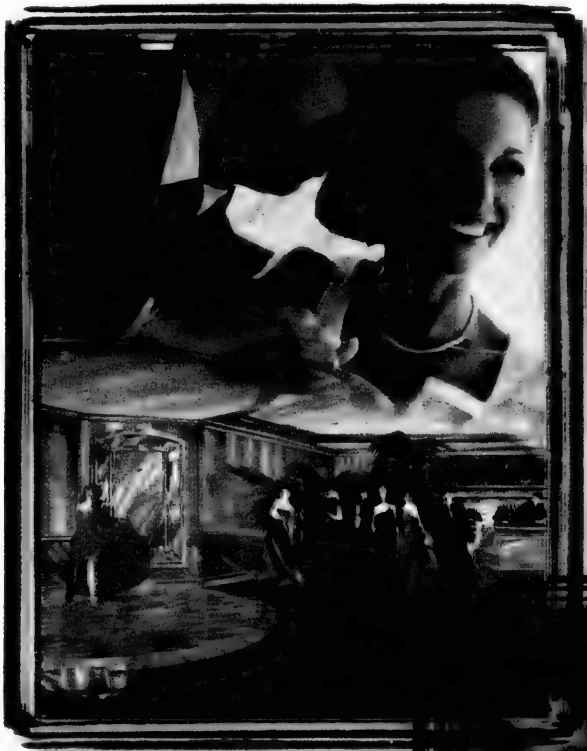
Alvear Palace: The residence of a lifetime

You could spend a lifetime searching for that special home you've always wanted: a home that combines privacy, comfort, elegant taste, and location. With one visit to Alvear Palace, on Bathurst Street at Steeles, your search will end.



Like the best five-star hotels, Alvear Palace combines a cosmopolitan setting with refined luxury, lavish finishes, old-fashioned high quality and up-to-date convenience. It's a world in its own right, where your every need has been attended to. It won't just meet your highest expectations: it will surpass them.

Alvear Palace was envisioned as a statement in architectural elegance, lavishly finished in precast concrete and double-glazed tinted glass, with careful attention to every detail. And this eight-storey residence, inspired by traditional manor architecture, contains only 44 suites.

Moreover, Alvear Palace is stunningly sited amidst a mix of town lands and parklands. Public parks, golf clubs and country clubs in the area, besides being easily accessible for your pleasure, make for green, pastoral surroundings.

When you enter through the lofty doors, the concierge greets you by name, beckons you to enter, and ushers you into a rare setting where every detail enhances your lifestyle, where nothing has been overlooked or compromised. Welcome to Thornhill's most gracious new condominium residence: Alvear Palace.

From your first moment here, you are enveloped in magnificence. In the stately lobby, you and your guest are surrounded by lavish marble, rich woods, opulent chandeliers and stunning decorator touches. Then, one of two whisper-quiet elevators whisks you away to a world of distinctiveness and exclusivity: your new home.

At Alvear Palace, your privacy is sacrosanct; and security, like every other feature of the building, is of the highest quality. There's a watchful concierge on duty and the 24-hour video security system is state-of-the-art.

And the care taken with the site and setting is matched within your home. Every suite is the epitome of distinguished living, while allowing plenty of room to accommodate your own unique statements and designer decorations.

You can choose a capacious one-, two or three-bedroom Residence; a ground-floor Patio Residence; or a superlative four-bedroom Penthouse Residence. Soaring nine-foot ceilings, plush 40-ounce carpeting, and upgraded doors and casings, make every room capacious and bright.

The penthouses, with their exceptional 9'4" ceilings, reach new heights in comfort. And their views of the city and countryside are nothing short of magnificent.

From your fabulously finished foyer with its custom entrance door, to the ultra-commodious living and dining areas, space abounds. The creators of Alvear Palace have done away with superfluous items that just make your living quarters smaller; but they've kept the substantive features that make a fine residence even finer.

The kitchen will bring out your inner chef, with its top-of-the-line appliances, and magnificent cabinetry with granite and marble countertops. Generous floor planning continues in the sumptuous master bedroom, whose superbly designed ensuite features the finest imported ceramics, marble counters, designer cabinetry and finishes. And there are easily accessible storage facilities.

Your social and entertainment needs are seen to as well. There's a spectacular multi-purpose lounge/ party room with bar and service kitchen; and there are two beautifully furnished overnight guest rooms.

But these are only a few colours in a whole palette of amenities. For example, a bevy of special services, including the finest kosher dining, is available through the nearby synagogue.

Although sheltered from the hectic pace of city life, Alvear Palace is superbly situated, connected to everything that's important to you. A few moments to the north is Highway 407, while other major highways, Yonge Street, TTC buses and the subway are close at hand.

The Bathurst-Steeles neighbourhood offers a large complement of private health clubs, golf courses, country clubs, and shopping. Synagogues, major city services, fashionable boutiques, theatres and fine dining are only minutes away.

As Alvear Palace is already built, you are saved numerous inconveniences. You can tour your own suite, and already know what it's going to look like, without having to puzzle over floor plans.

Don't delay, though. Alvear Palace is a boutique building, with only 44 suites; and only a few are still available. Call the sales office to make an appointment now: 905-669-9909.

Coalition backs Palestinians

He said the KAIROS letter is striking because it "does not hold Palestinians accountable for anything," and because it states that negotiations have failed.

"Israel has been willing to negotiate, but they have to have someone as their partner," Vernon said.

Dale Hildebrand, KAIROS' spokesperson on Mideast matters, says talks between Israel and the Palestinians "haven't been very fruitful, and it doesn't seem possible the two parties will agree without outside intervention."

Hildebrand said his group's letter calls for "a new direction. What's been tried clearly hasn't worked. We need to work toward a solution."

He conceded that, in effect, the letter calls for Canada to help "impose" that solution. However, he added, "we would never endorse a violent approach."

Asked whether his group's view reflects that of its constituent churches, Hildebrand said, "this is a very sensitive area for the churches. We speak for KAIROS and its board of directors, and not for individual churches. We wouldn't want to undermine the views of the churches."

Retired bishop slams Israel

TORONTO — The retired bishop of the Anglican diocese of Ottawa made scathing remarks about Israel last month at a screening in the capital of a video produced by the Canadian Friends of Sabeel, a Palestinian Christian centre based in Jerusalem.

"What we see happening in the Holy Land is official oppression – evil being done," Bishop John Baycroft is quoted as saying in a recent issue of the Catholic Register.

He also compared the Mideast conflict to apartheid-era South Africa, and predicted there will one day be "a triumph for freedom and human dignity even in this evil situation."

Canadian Jewish Congress has been working with Anglican representatives through the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation, a group set up to facilitate dialogue.

Congress and other Jewish groups are still stinging from a front-page story last summer in the Anglican Journal that placed the blame for the Arab-Israeli conflict squarely on Israel, and repeated Palestinian allegations that Israel was sanctioning a "second holocaust."

Charness is JWI's Woman of the Year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a perfect world, Susan Charness says she would put herself out of business.

As owner and founder of Susan Charness Talent, an agency for people with disabilities, she says "people are not handicapped by disabilities; they are handicapped by social attitudes."

Charness, who has walked with crutches since she was diagnosed with polio at age five, shortly after arriving in Halifax with her family from Germany in 1951, is Jewish Women International of Toronto's 2002 Woman of the Year. She will be honoured at the organization's 45th annual Woman of the Year luncheon on April 7.

Susan Charness

She learned from an early age, she says, that "life is not what happens to you; it is all attitude. Attitude determines altitude."

As a child of immigrant parents, says Charness, she was "over-protected. The more protective they were, the more I over-compensated. If you over-compensate enough, you begin to believe it."

She never stopped being ashamed about her disability, however, until she met her husband Monty, a documentary filmmaker. "He taught me that I was a person, not a disability."

It was Monty, she says, who about 12 years ago, conceived the idea for her business. He was on the set of a television show, "and he noticed that no one on the set had a disability. He told me I should start an agency.

"I got a list from the actor's union and I began calling. I called advertising agencies and then I started going straight to the CEOs. I just kept at it; I was relentless. I learned that 'no' was just another word for 'yes'."

Eventually, she says, she built up a client list and started getting work. "One of my clients modelled in the [recent] Toronto Fashion Week sponsored by such companies as L'Oreal, Holt Renfrew and Mercedes Benz, and the Bay and Sears have used clients in many print ads.

Charness received the Order of Ontario in November 2000 after being nominated by her client, CityTV reporter Wendy Murphy.

What she is working towards, Charness says, is for her clients to audition as people, not as people with disabilities.

"Things have improved a lot [since I went into business]. People are accepting and places have become accessible, but a lot more has to happen."

Attitudes must change, she says. "When people look at people with disabilities, they see the fragility of life. It hits home, and it is frightening for them. They don't understand that it is not a disability that makes a person, it is character.

"True character is shown when you treat someone who can't do a lot of good for you, as well as you treat someone who can."

She says she is "honoured" to have been chosen Woman of the Year. "I was happy and excited to get the phone call, but I know that I am no good without my clients. If they did not believe in themselves, I would not be doing anything. It is a true partnership."

For information on the Woman of the Year luncheon, call JWI at 416-630-9313.

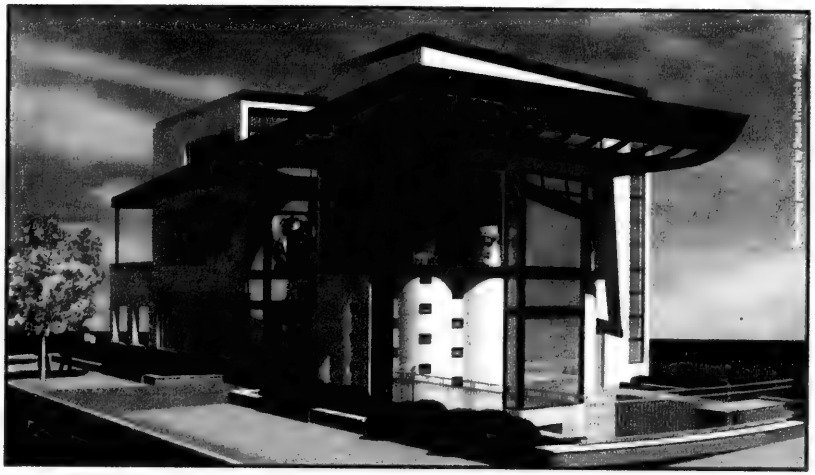
The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life:
A Place to Call Their Own

One of the most vibrant Jewish campus communities in North America is about to get a new permanent home.



The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life will provide 4,500 Jewish U of T students and other downtown campuses such as Ryerson and George Brown, with a place of their own to explore their cultural heritage in an open and comfortable setting.

The new spacious, multifunctional facility, which is scheduled for completion in Fall 2003, will house the headquarters of Jewish Campus Services, the primary agency, funded by UJA Federation, for Jewish students at colleges and universities across the GTA. The center will offer a wide range of innovative educational, cultural and social programs designed to attract city-wide participation.

"The Centre meets a growing critical need among Jewish students to be engaged in Jewish life through a wide array of campus based activities," explains Zac Kaye, Executive Director of Jewish Campus Services. "By offering students a secure and nurturing environment in which to grow we are in essence strengthening their ties to the community."

Above: The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Right: Students, seen here in the current cramped quarters of the Jewish Student Union at U of T, look forward to the imminent move to the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

With the campus being a traditional hotbed of political activity, the Wolfond Centre will provide information-thirsty students with the tools and resources they need to accurately inform students about the situation in Israel. "The very existence of the Wolfond Centre will empower young people to confront the uniquely diverse challenges they face, especially those peculiar to the campus setting", adds Kaye.

Front and Centre

Situated in the heart of the U of T campus at the historic corner of Harbord and Huron, the Wolfond Centre's ideal location will make it the natural hub of downtown Jewish student life.

"The location is excellent," enthuses Ottawa native Becca Siggner, who, as a newcomer, was grateful for the friendly welcome and practical help she received from U of T's Jewish Students Union. "I see it becoming a favourite place to hang out", she says.

Spacious, modern meeting rooms, a cozy fireside lounge and a pleasant indoor/outdoor courtyard will accommodate a full complement of student activity. "The Centre will be a place where students of all backgrounds can feel comfortable and welcome," says Rose Wolfe, Chair of the Wolfond Centre Tribute Committee. "By providing them with this Centre, the community is showing how much we care about their future."

"...the Centre will provide students with a comfortable environment through which they can explore their roots, enrich their identities and deepen their connection to the Toronto Jewish Community." adds Henry Wolfond, lead gift contributor.

Highly visible and easily accessible to students studying and living in the downtown area, the Centre will serve to strengthen and enhance the historically prominent Jewish presence at U of T. For more information call Jewish campus services at 416-785-1465.

Tikkun Olam, Salvadoran dirt and me

By RYANN MILLER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was over 40 degrees and not even lunchtime yet. I was digging the foundation of a Salvadoran home several Tuesdays ago and trying to speak Spanish with a seven-year-old girl. Until that week, I had never attempted either. I had also never raised money to send myself to El Salvador for a week of social action in village communities.

During their respective reading weeks, 10 York students and 10 U of T students went to Ciudad Romero on a trip called Alternative Spring Break: El Salvador. The program was conceived and organized by American Jewish World Service, with help from Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto and Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee. Our partner organization in El Salvador was La Coordinadora. It was thanks to these non-governmental organizations that we were able to dive into social action on a very grassroots level.

Our days were spent learning about and helping a community that has been ravaged by civil war, Hurricane Mitch and the earthquakes of '98 and '99, not to mention the daily hardships of living in abject poverty. On the plane ride down, I had asked myself what my relationship was to social service and, more specifically, Jewish social service. I didn't have much of an answer.

But after one week, the 10 of us, along with 15 Brandeis University students, learned much more than we ever thought possible about social action and Judaism's relationship to it. We also learned a great deal about the Salvadoran people's struggle for dignity and basic human rights, and bonded with people as we realized that their liberation is connected to ours.

But why did this matter to a bunch of North American, middle class, Jewish 20-somethings? Part of our journey was finding answers to this question. The other part of the journey was spent digging foundations for earthquake-resistant homes for families, distributing Dengue Fever prevention bags as part of a water purification initiative and participating in a reforestation project at La Coordinadora's tree nursery that will benefit the whole community.

One of the amazing things about this trip was how broad-based and all-encompassing it was. We discussed theories of Judaism and social justice and then acted on those principles. Armed with concepts like tikkun olam, tzedakah and gemilut chassadim, we began to see a connection between our Jewish social action roots and Ciudad Romero.

I experienced this connection in many different ways. There was the 12-year-old boy named Juan who helped us dig the foundation of his family's house. When I took a water break and wiped the dirt off my face, he laughed at me. I apologized, in broken Spanish, for not being strong. He smiled and said that together we would build a home for his family. That moment reminded me of why I was there: together we could make a difference and together we would try to right one of the many wrongs of our world.

Another time, all 25 of us participated in one of the community's peaceful conflict-resolution meetings for the local teenagers. Because many men in El Salvador carry guns and rifles, conflict resolution is a very real issue. The abuse of power has been moderated, but not eliminated entirely. The teenagers talked about the threat of gangs and violence and how all they really wanted was to exist peacefully, without any trouble, and not get involved in the violence that seems to underscore their country's recent history. They told us they all wanted to go to university, like us. I felt a number of conflicting emotions then. I hated the violence that has destroyed families and futures in El Salvador. I was angry at the powers that be for maintaining an economic system that gives priority to the rich elite and keeps most Salvadorans too poor to feel that they can do anything. And I felt compassion for these kids – almost our age – who didn't have the opportunities we did, through no fault of their own.

Why was I so lucky? My parents always told me, "You can grow up to do whatever you set your mind to." Why were these kids denied the right to a peaceful existence, a healthy standard of living and, most likely, higher education? I realized, while sitting in the peaceful conflict-resolution group, that my life and opportunities meant not that I was deserving of all that I had, but instead that I had a responsibility. My life is a symbol of privilege and opportunity in North America. This privilege must be held accountable and must be distributed more evenly. My personal mission for global justice and peace was born then and there.

The trip was non-sectarian, so while we learned about global responsibility and social justice from a Jewish perspective, our participation in helping the community had no religious affiliation. Personally, this aspect of the program appealed to me greatly, because I see non-sectarian compassionate action as reflecting Deuteronomy's 28:9 appeal that humankind walk in God's ways. I interpret this to mean that we have a responsibility to imitate God's work as a life-giver and sustainer. Because Judaism is once again thriving in the world, especially in North America, Jewry has a duty to look beyond our local communities to give. In this age, our community is global and our responsibility universal.

So Salvadoran dirt was the means for us to participate in a truly grassroots tikkun olam project. And me? Well, I now understand the connection. Gracias for the opportunity and shalom.

Ottawa memorial recalls Pearl

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Daniel Pearl was 38 years old, the same age as Scott Anderson, editor-in-chief of the Ottawa Citizen. For Anderson, that was one of the things that made Pearl's death so personal.

Anderson, the master of ceremonies at a memorial service for Pearl held here last month at Congregation Beth Shalom, said the Wall Street Journal reporter was kidnapped and murdered in Pakistan for being an American, a journalist and a Jew.

"For journalists, Daniel Pearl's brutal death symbolizes a new era in news gathering," Anderson told the several hundred people in attendance. "We can no longer assume journalists will be considered impartial observers. Journalists are targets as well. Daniel Pearl is part of that new reality."

In Pearl's memory, Anderson said the Citizen plans to purchase copies of a book of Pearl's stories being compiled by the Wall Street Journal and distribute them to local schools and libraries.

Noting that Pearl's widow has received messages of condolence even from people in the Arab world, Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon told the gathering to focus on this positive outcome of the tragedy.

"I think this is one of the legacies which we all should remember of Daniel Pearl: that his brutal death will not be in vain… that it will bring about tolerance and understanding to be able to remove hatred, bigotry and anti-Semitism," Divon said.

American Ambassador Paul Cellucci vowed his country will continue to pursue Pearl's murderers.

"We will continue our fight to bring to justice the killers of Daniel Pearl… and we will do everything possible to ensure that tragic events such as these do not happen again," Cellucci said.

Andrew Burns, British high commissioner to Ottawa who served as his country's ambassador to Israel from 1992 to 1995, said he feels close ties to Israel, its people and its struggles.

"The killing of Daniel Pearl reinforces the need to rout out terrorism wherever it occurs," he said.

Don Boudria, Canada's minister of public works and government services, offered condolences on behalf of the government of Canada.

Of Pearl's murderers, he said: "The beliefs we hold should be our guiding force for a better life and afterlife, and not an excuse to end life…"

Representatives of Congregation Beth Shalom and the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa also spoke and memorial prayers were recited.

INTERGENERATIONAL SEDER: Hamilton's Kehila Jewish Community Day School invited its families and seniors from Shalom Village retirement home to the school's first inter-generational model seder. Here Grade 2 student Judah Glogauer helps 90-year-old Eva Levy with her charoset and matzah. Assisting is Barbara Abraham, volunteer co-ordinator at Hamilton's Shalom Village Residence for seniors. Levy said she enjoyed being with the students. "I think this is beautiful. Children always love the seder, and they respect their parents more if they are included in what goes on." Coast to Coast

The media's label of 'illegality' is destructive

As of this writing, the Arab League summit in Beirut is about to get underway and the media are gearing up. Some analysts believe the conference could be a major turning point in Arab attitudes towards Israel; others, however, continue to express skepticism. More next week as events unfold.

In the meantime, there is an important follow-up to a report in this column two weeks ago about UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan's March 12 address to the Security Council. In it he mistakenly described Israel's presence in the territories as "illegal," creating a furor whose repercussions are still being felt.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

George P. Fletcher, professor of law at Columbia University, noted that Annan refuses to acknowledge that after fighting the 1967 defensive war, Israel was entitled to retain territory pending negotiations leading to full peace and security guarantees as prescribed in UN Resolution 242. In disclaiming this, Annan was attempting nothing less than a "redefinition" of the Middle East conflict ("Annan's Careless Language" New York Times, March 21).

This vital point has all too often been misunderstood or completely overlooked by the media. As a result, many people assume that the Palestinians are fully justified in waging a violent struggle against Israel to achieve liberation from an "unjust" or "illegal" occupation.

As Fletcher noted, "A new and provocative label of 'illegality' is now out of the chute and running loose, ready to wreak damage. The worst prospect is that Palestinians will dig in with a new feeling of righteousness and believe that the international community will force Israel to withdraw from its 'illegal' occupation.:. In this time of crisis and forgetfulness, using the term 'illegal' is destructive and dangerous."

Fletcher continues that UN Security Council Resolution 338, passed in 1973 after the Yom Kippur War, "imposes an obligation on Israel and the Arabs to negotiate peace. Because it insisted that the Palestinians negotiate an end to the Israeli presence, the Security Council could not have thought the occupation itself violated international law."

Fletcher's insistence on the facts seems to have resounded in the halls of the UN. Two days after Fletcher's article appeared, Frederick Eckhard, spokesman for Kofi Annan insisted that Annan had used the term "illegal" only in reference to certain aspects of Israel's presence in the territories, but not to its presence in general (letter, New York Times, March 23).

This is not merely hair-splitting or pettifogging. It goes to the heart of why Israel is entitled – some would say "obligated" – to remain in the territories awaiting negotiated safeguards for a withdrawal, the extent of which is also subject to those negotiations.

It is also why some critics, especially those on the left, who most want to see Israel free from the burden of occupation, insist that only a negotiated resolution rather than a unilateral withdrawal will accomplish this.

But for that to happen, world leaders must abide by historical facts, and the Palestinians must stop the violence and terrorism and allow negotiations to resume.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

SPEAKING OUT: Ten-year-old Sarah Goldberg spoke about volunteering with Out of the Cold, a program for the hungry, in her speech on mitzvot at Hamilton's 25th annual Morris Black Speaking Contest, which invites children from grades 4 to 8 write and deliver speeches on Jewish themes. The contest memorializes Morris Black, who left money in his will to sponsor the event. Goldberg shared second place in her group with Chava Starkman, whose spoke about Maimonides.

Jewish secular humanist schools connect

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Representatives of Canada's three secular humanist Jewish Sunday schools met here last month to talk about areas of common interest.

"It was fantastic to be able to meet with our colleagues from Vancouver and Toronto," said Lissa Donner, the education chair for Winnipeg's United Jewish Peoples Order, the youngest of the three schools. "We agreed to share resources. That will make a big difference to a small volunteer-run organization like ours."

Jefri Knazen represented Vancouver's Peretz Centre for Secular Jewish Culture at the meetings on March 16 and 17, while Frances Handlorski and Maxine Hermolin, respectively the education chair of the Morris Winchevsky School and executive director of the Morris Winchevsky Centre, came from Toronto.

They discussed practical matters such as teacher and student recruitment, advertising, outreach, holiday celebrations and evaluation. They also agreed to establish a joint Web site to facilitate communication between the three schools.

"We decided to work together because of our shared philosophy of education," Hermolin said. "We have created a coalition to interconnect our schools and deliver similar programming."

The schools, Hermolin said, cater to people who are unaffiliated but looking for ways to celebrate their Judaism.

The three, she said, are offshoots of the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO), a national Yiddishist socialist organization with active chapters in Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg. The schools teach Jewish traditions and culture and celebrate the holidays from a secular humanist perspective.

"We have Passover seders, for example, using our own haggadahs," Hermolin says. "We make the Exodus relevant by emphazing the struggle for freedom and social justice in the world, ideals we teach in our schools, too.

"And our bnei mitzvah celebrations encompass candlelighting, music, poetry and research presentations. It makes for a meaningful coming of age and is a real highlight of the secular humanist school experience."

Of the three schools, Toronto's 74-year-old Winchevsky School is the oldest. The Peretz Institute is more than 40 years old, while the Sholem Aleichem School has been open for five years.

The Toronto program has about 40 students enrolled this year, while the Peretz Institute has 30 in its two-year bnei mitzvah program. (Vancouver also has a small elementary group, Hermolin said.) Sholem Aleichem has 15 students this year.

The Winchevsky School, Hermolin said, is under the umbrella of Toronto's UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, but because the school is not part of the religious mainstream, it has limited finances and human resources. "The majority of Jews are unaffiliated, but it's hard to get the word out that we exist," she said.

Last fall, the Peretz Centre opened a new building in partnership with the city of Vancouver that combines education and housing. Sholem Aleichem and Morris Winchevsky representatives attended the opening and that's when the plans were made to formally meet in Winnipeg, Hermolin said.

"We have been talking for a number of years," she said. "I was actually invited to Winnipeg a few years ago to help get the Sholem Aleichem School going."

Arafat 'enemy of the entire free world,' Sharon says

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat "Israel's enemy and the enemy of the entire free world" in a brief televised address to the nation Sunday evening.

Sharon accused Arafat of leading a campaign of terror and said Israel "must fight… an uncompromising war to uproot these savages, to dismantle their infrastructure because there is no compromise with terrorists.

"We co-operated with United States envoy Anthony Zinni, and in return we got terrorism. I decided to give up my demand for seven days of quiet, and in return we got terrorism. We withdrew the Israeli army forces from the [Palestinian] cities, and in return we got terrorism," he said.

The statement came as Israel endured a slew of attacks – beginning with a suicide bombing at a Passover seder in Netanya – and as the IDF operation against Arafat's Ramallah compound, which began last Friday, was broadened with the IDF's entry into Beit Jala on Sunday after mortar fire on the Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo.

The IDF plans to take over more cities and towns for periods longer than any previous operations since the start of the intifadah 18 months ago. But the IDF stressed it only intends to stay in the cities as long as it takes to search for wanted terrorists and uproot their network and infrastructure.

So far, a great deal of the material found in Arafat's compound, the Muqata'a, includes weapons banned by the Oslo accords, such as anti-armour weapons. The compound also yielded a large collection of documents linking the PA leadership with the terrorist attacks inside Israel.

IDF forces have asked Arafat and his entourage to give up a number of Palestinians who have taken refuge in the Muqata'a and who are wanted by Israel. These include Palestinians involved in the arms smuggling on the Karine-A. At the same time, assurances were given to Arafat that he will not be harmed.

In the meantime, diplomatic efforts were in high gear Sunday as international mediators tried to convince Arafat to adopt the ceasefire proposal put forth by U.S. envoy Anthony Zinni last week. The UN Security Council Resolution 1402, passed last Friday, that called for an immediate ceasefire and the full co-operation of the two sides with Zinni, increased pressure on Arafat.

Both sides seem to be drawing on the support of their respective allies.

On Sunday, U.S. President George Bush said that Arafat "can do a lot more" to prevent attacks against Israelis and that the United States supports Israel's right to defend itself.

Sunday also saw attacks on Israeli positions on the northern border, with Hezbollah firing anti-armour rockets and mortars, resulting in a brisk exchange of fire between the IDF and the Lebanese militants, as well as Israeli air strikes.

Bush did not speak with Arafat or Sharon. He urged all Middle East leaders to strongly condemn the attacks against Israelis, but singled out Arafat.

"He has got to speak up," Bush said. "He needs to stand up and condemn… these attacks."

But Bush also said Israel must work to reduce the violence. He urged Israel to "make sure there is a path to peace as she secures her homeland."

IDF sources said incursions into more Palestinian towns appear very likely after a wave of recent Palestinian attacks.

In Haifa last Sunday, at least 14 people were killed and more than 30 injured, four seriously, when a suicide bomber hit the Matza restaurant.

The restaurant, which was crowded at the time of the blast, is owned by Jews but run by Israeli Arabs.

Hamas claimed responsibility and identified the bomber as an 18-year-old resident of the West Bank refugee camp of Jenin. His family said he carried an Israeli identity card, meaning he was an Israeli citizen.

"We will continue the martyrdom attacks on Israel until the full withdrawal from Palestinian territory," Hamas said over loudspeakers in the camp.

Later, in downtown Tel Aviv, about 25 people were wounded, five seriously, when a suicide bomber detonated a bomb at about 9:30 p.m. in the My Coffee Shop café. The owner said it was only partially full at the time.

The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, linked to Arafat's Fatah movement, took responsibility for the attack in "the heart of the Zionist entity."

Less than two hours after the Haifa blast, a suicide bomber injured four people, one critically and another seriously, in an attack on the West Bank settlement of Efrat's commercial centre.

Five Israelis also died over the weekend in three separate incidents.

Two elderly Israeli men were stabbed and killed last Friday morning by a Palestinian who infiltrated the Neztarim settlement in Gaza.

Last Sunday, a border police officer was shot dead in the village of Baka al-Garbiyeh, on the Green Line border, during an exchange of fire with two Palestinians who were trying to cross into Israel. Border police shot and killed the two would-be infiltrators.

In an anonymous phone call, a spokesperson for the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades said the two were trying to enter Israel to carry out a suicide attack.

Last Friday afternoon, two Israelis were killed and more than 30 others were injured in a suicide bombing at a supermarket in Jerusalem's Kiryat Yovel neighbourhood. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades said the bomber was an 18-year-old female from a refugee camp near Bethlehem.

"Israel's three main cities were hit in three days. Palestinian suicide bombers have made terror attacks a daily event," said David Baker, an official in the prime minister's office.

In response to the suicide attack in Netanya, the Israeli operation in Ramallah began Friday morning with the positioning of IDF armour and infantry units near Arafat's headquarters.

The IDF penetrated the compound and attacked each building, searching for gunmen, arms caches and wanted terrorists. In some cases the fighting was intense, and two Israeli soldiers were killed. At least 12 Palestinians were also reported killed during the fighting.

With electricity cut and communication reduced to one cell phone, Arafat – isolated on a single floor and surrounded by his closest advisers and bodyguards – made a frantic effort to call world leaders, asking them to stop the Israeli incursion. He also gave defiant TV interviews, saying he would rather die than be exiled or detained.

Israeli military sources said supplies provided to the compound included pita bread, mineral water, cheese, eggs, flashlights, candles and canned meat.

Defence Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said soldiers had strict orders not to enter Arafat's building and not to harm him in any way. Ben-Eliezer gave no indication that Arafat's confinement would be eased.

"He [Arafat] brought this upon himself… This isolation will separate him from the terror groups," Ben-Eliezer said.

Sharon convened his security cabinet Sunday to discuss the ongoing Ramallah operation, as well as the response to the escalating wave of terror attacks. The meeting lasted three hours and no decisions were made. Sharon said deliberations would resume Monday or Tuesday.

The main issue at the meeting was Arafat's isolation, after the ministers heard about the IDF plan for the continuation of the operation in the territories.

Syria helps Hezbollah: Israel

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel believes that Syrian President Bashar Assad has been ignoring Jerusalem's warnings about curtailing the activities of Hezbollah on the northern border.

Well-informed sources claim that Assad – who, they say, is also disregarding U.S. warnings on the matter – seems to have changed his attitude toward Hezbollah's operations against Israel, presumably on the assumption that Israel is not interested in opening a second front along the northern border and is in no hurry to intervene in the activities of the Shi'ite Muslim organization in Lebanon.

The assessments of the Israeli sources are based on recently accumulated information and are causing concern with regard to a possible escalation on the Israel-Lebanon border.

Following the events of Sept. 11, Israel confirmed that Assad was taking steps to rein in Hezbollah in an effort to ward off U.S. action against Syria in the framework of the war against terror. Recently, sources in the know said Assad had taken action to put an end to arms shipments from Tehran to Lebanon via Damascus, and that Hezbollah had taken to using alternative routes.

The sources say Hezbollah wants to drag Israel into a confrontation along the northern border and that the organization intends to respond harshly in the event that Israel carries out strikes against Syrian or Lebanese targets.

At this stage, all the Israel Defence Forces reserve units that have been called up recently have been slated for operations in the territories. The IDF is, however, readying for the possibility of a flare-up along the northern border.

Senior reserve officers were called in to the Northern Command Sunday to prepare for a scenario in which Hezbollah would try to cause a deterioration in the situation along the border with Lebanon. The command is preparing for a massive Hezbollah attack on Israel within the next day or two.

"Israel is close to the moment at which it will say, 'Enough is enough' with regard to the north," a security source said yesterday. "We are very concerned about the preparations being made there in anticipation of attacks against us. Syria is chiefly responsible for this and Israel is likely to respond with a strong strike against Syrian interests in Lebanon if it is attacked again."

Bomb found in Red Crescent ambulance

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian ambulance was found carrying a bomb near Jerusalem last Friday. The bomb was hidden under a gurney on which a sick Palestinian child was lying. The driver confessed that this was not the first time ambulances have been used to carry bombs.

The bomb was taken out of the ambulance and detonated in the presence of representatives of the international committee of the Red Cross (ICRC).

"The ICRC understands the security concerns of the Israeli authorities and has always acknowledged their right to check ambulances, provided it does not unduly delay medical evacuations," the ICRC said in a statement on Friday. The Red Crescent expressed shock at the incident, and said they had started an internal investigation.

According to the Israel Defence Forces, the driver, Islam Jibril, 31, who was already on the IDF's blacklist, confessed to having tried to smuggle in the bomb. He admitted that this was not the first time an ambulance was used to transfer terrorists and bombs, and that Red Crescent workers are among those sent on terror missions, a charge that until now the Red Cross and Red Crescent have forcefully rejected.

Jibril said the bomb – configured as a belt to be worn by a suicide bomber – was given to him by Mahmoud Titi of the Al Aqsa Brigades. Sources in Nablus affiliated with Titi, told Ha'aretz Sunday that they do not transfer weapons through IDF checkpoints and do not use ambulances, because checks at the checkpoints, and especially those of ambulances, are thorough.

Apparently, the ambulance, on its way from Nablus to Ramallah, went through four other checkpoints before the bomb was uncovered. Jibril was driving his sister-in-law and her three small children – one very sick. A physician, Dr. Rassan Hamdan, was sitting with the driver in front. Hamdan said soldiers searched the ambulance at the Hawara checkpoint outside Nablus, but did not check the IDs of the passengers or the driver. The ambulance then went through three other checkpoints, uninterrupted.

"A jeep suddenly sped scarily toward us and signaled to us with its headlights. The soldiers got off the jeep and started shooting in the air. We stopped, and they shouted at us in Hebrew to get out of the vehicle," Hamdan said.

The IDF reserve soldier who stopped the ambulance said he became suspicious because the ambulance was driving very fast but did not turn on the siren. When the ambulance did not stop despite the signals, the soldiers fired shots in the air, he told Ha'aretz.

Two or three hours later Hamdan, the woman and the three children were allowed to return to Ramallah.

Anti-Israel protests intensify across Arab world

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Anti-Israel protests grew violent throughout the Arab world earlier this week. Riot police fired tear gas and water cannons at demonstrators headed toward the Israeli Embassy here as Arabs took to the streets for the fourth straight day on Monday, calling on their governments to get tougher with Israel.

In the Egyptian town of Sohag, thousands of university students and teachers burned Israeli flags and asked their leaders to take steps against Israel.

In Jordan, at least four protests broke out. At the University of Jordan, anti-riot police used batons to prevent some 500 angry demonstrators from leaving the campus. In Zarqa, 27 kilometres northeast of Amman, about 3,000 people chanted "Death to Israel" and called for a jihad against the Jewish State.

In the Ein el-Hilweh refugee camps on the outskirts of the southern Lebanese city of Sidon, hundreds of people chanted, "We want to blow up embassies if [Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser] Arafat becomes a martyr. We want to hijack planes if Arafat becomes a martyr."

In Alexandria, Egypt, about 10,000 people gathered in support of the Palestinians. A similar number attended a demonstration in Bangladesh, while Arab diplomats and their families protested outside the Palestinian Embassy in Beijing.

After talks with Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Maher on Sunday, Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Shaath rejected U.S. criticism that Arafat can do more to stop Palestinian suicide attacks. "President Arafat is a hostage," he said. "The Palestinian people in Ramallah are hostages of Israeli forces, and the American president speaks of Israel's right to defend itself... This is very astonishing. We have not seen this before."

Lebanese President Emile Lahoud issued a statement Monday condemning what he called international silence over the suffering of the Palestinians. "Time has come for Israel to know that the policy of imposing security by force will not succeed in making the Palestinian people abandon their rights," he said.

The president of the United Arab Emirates, Sheik Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan, called on the United States to act to implement Saturday's UN Security Council resolution that said Israel should immediately withdraw from Palestinian towns, including Ramallah. (Washington supported the resolution, but called on Arafat to do more to quell the violence.)

In Iraq, President Saddam Hussein urged Arab countries to adopt "economic measures" against Israel and its supporters. He did not elaborate, but the ruling Baath party issued a statement calling on Arabs to use oil as a weapon.

Executive Director

BEASTS...

based on the Midrash

The first shafts of light appeared over the horizon as Moshe (Moses) walked to the Nile, the great river that sustained all of Egypt. He pushed apart the wall of bulrushes, and there was Pharaoh, Egypt's king.

"Moshe," gasped Pharaoh, "How did you know I was here?"

"God told me I would find you here. He also told me that in three weeks He will bring a fourth plague upon Egypt. Fierce animals will overrun the country. Are you sure you don't want to let the Jews go and worship God in the desert?"

Pharaoh thought for a minute, as the murky waters of the Nile churned behind him. The first three plagues hadn't really been so bad. Who is this Moshe to tell me what to do? I, the King of Egypt! "GET OUT OF HERE!" he roared, his face contorted with fury. Moshe calmly turned and left through the swaying bulrushes.

The first shafts of light appeared over the horizon. In the pale morning light, the Egyptians in the streets pointed in disbelief. "They're coming!" "It's true!" "The animals are coming!" Distant roars echoed through the desert, and almost imperceptibly, the ground trembled. The swarm of animals grew nearer. Elephants trumpeted. Komodo dragons licked at the air. Hyenas laughed. Cougars growled. The Egyptians fled into their houses and locked their doors.

Pharaoh nervously looked through his barred window at the animals massing in the streets. A loud clanging reverberated through the room as his guards secured the double doors with iron bars. Pharaoh petted his cat, Abyssinia. "We're safe," he smiled.

He shrieked as Abyssinia dug her sharp teeth into his finger. She glared at him and slowly backed away. A howl erupted in the street as the animals tried to break through the doors. The hinges rattled but would not give. "We're safe," he muttered again.

A long, slimy tentacle eased its way through the window. Pharaoh recoiled in horror as it slithered across the room and lifted the iron bars securing the doors. The tentacle withdrew, and the doors fell open. The sea of animals poured into the palace, as Pharaoh fled to his private chambers where he cowered under his bed. A blast of cold air swept into the room. A huge white bear entered, and silently surveyed its new territory. It lumbered onto Pharaoh's bed, smiled, and went to sleep.

"Moshe! Aharon (Aaron)!" screamed Pharaoh.

"Yes?" said Moshe, standing next to his brother Aharon in the doorway.

"How... how did you know I... how did you get here?" sputtered Pharaoh.

"You called for me, didn't you?"

The polar bear let out a particularly loud snore.

"Get these animals out of here! Go and worship God in the desert! Just get rid of these... beasts!"

"I will leave the city now and pray that the plague end. But Pharaoh, keep your word this time."

"Of course," gasped Pharaoh, as Moshe and Aharon turned and left. Pharaoh stayed under his bed, listening to their receding footsteps, listening to the roars in the streets, listening to the rhythmic snoring of the great white bear....

The snoring abruptly stopped. Hesitantly, Pharaoh crawled out from under his bed. The bear was gone. He cautiously left his bedroom. The hall was empty. Nervously, he descended the staircase. There was absolute silence.

Abyssinia met him at the bottom. She rubbed against his leg and purred.

Moshe entered. "It's all arranged," he said. "We'll leave tomorrow, and in three days...."

"You're not going anywhere," Pharaoh declared. "The Jews will remain slaves here. Forever!"

Moshe, knowing Pharaoh would change his mind, shook his head sadly, and left.

At The Bernard Betel Centre

Mrs. F. suddenly needed help.

When her husband's homecare was cut back from 4 hours to 45 minutes a week, the 71-year-old caregiving wife had virtually no time off.

Her husband had suffered two strokes and had Parkinson's. She constantly worried about him falling, and did not feel comfortable leaving him alone.

She had health problems of her own compounded by the stress related to being "on duty" 24 hours-a-day, 7-days a-week.

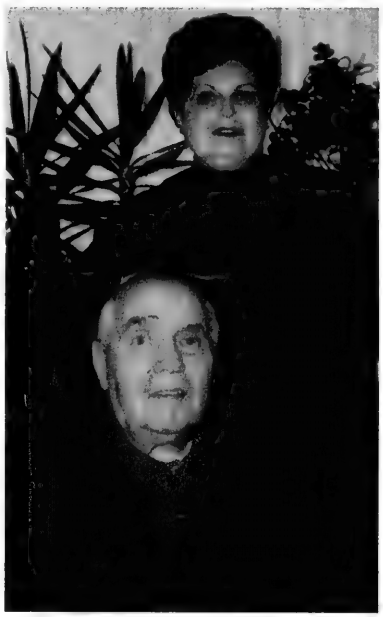
Help was literally just around the corner, at Bathurst and Steeles.

Mrs. F. found the support she needed from The Bernard Betel Centre's At-Home Respite Program.

This free service pairs caregivers with volunteers who can give them a break for a few hours once a week. (No nursing or physical care is provided.) The homebound person receives quality companionship while the caregiver receives precious free time.

Matches are very carefully made; enduring friendships develop. It's a win-win situation.

'The beauty of this program, the reason it works so well, is that the caring, compassionate people who volunteer do so because they want to, not because they have to'



Mady and Sam Grotsky: It means a lot to them both to have volunteer visits.

Mrs. F. now has something wonderful to look forward to every Monday: She goes swimming, shops or attends to personal appointments during the volunteer's three-hour visit. She is getting the relief she so greatly deserves and needs.

Similarly, Mady and Sam Grotsky's lives changed dramatically in 1997 after Sam suffered a disabling stroke – his right side was paralyzed, he lost his speech and can only move about slowly with a cane.

One of the Grotskys' daughters-in-law happened to see Paula Mintzberg, respite services co-ordinator, talking about the respite program on a morning TV show. "Quick, get on the phone," she told Mady. They joined the program almost four years ago and continue to receive weekly visits.

It means a lot to her and, especially, Sam to know their volunteer will be back each week. "The beauty of this program, the reason it works so well, is that the caring, compassionate people who volunteer do so because they want to, not because they have to," says Mintzberg.

The Bernard Betel Centre was the first, and remains the only agency in Toronto providing at-home respite care at no cost to caregivers.

The service is part of the centre's community outreach department. Within its walls this not-for-profit community centre offers exciting recreational, educational and social activities to independent seniors – adding life to their years and years to their life.

It is a place to learn and grow, enjoy kosher food, meet new friends, make a difference, find a little help, have a lot of fun – and much more.

The Bernard Betel Centre's Jewish heritage is reflected in everything we do. We take pride in celebrating Jewish holidays, culture and values. Religious services are held at the centre every Shabbat morning and on Jewish holidays.

Our capable staff who speak English, Russian, Hebrew, Polish and French, are always eager to greet new members.

Come visit us in North York. We're at 1003 Steeles Ave. West or call 416-225-2112 to find out how we can make a difference in your life.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival courts laughter and controversy

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As they prepare for their 10th season, organizers of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival exude confidence that they are offering one of their best programmes ever.

"We had an unusually good track record this year, in terms of getting everything we wanted," said programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg.

"I think we have a very 'edgy' lineup of films. By 'edgy' I mean that the films have a lot of edge to them. We're offering a lot of powerful and controversial movies."

The fest opens April 20 with the world premiere of the Canadian-made film, Schmelvis: Searching for the King's Jewish Roots. The film explores evidence that the legendary American pop idol Elvis Presley is descended from Jews along his maternal line, making him Jewish according to Jewish law.

Turns out the King was always friendly and supportive of Jews around him, wore a golden Chai symbol around his neck, and even put a Magen David on his mother's tombstone.

Comic and bizarre, Schmelvis ends up posing more questions than it answers. At times it seems like a remarkable and highly clever "quest" film that explores central issues of Jewish identity. Even if at moments it seems of dubious significance, it's always hugely entertaining.

Although the Montreal and Vancouver Jewish film festivals were both unsure about Schmelvis, organizers of the Toronto fest, the second largest in North America, grabbed the film without hesitation. As Schwartzberg acknowledges, the festival has always been idiosyncratic and keen to march to its own drummer.

"I think we've chosen a really catchy film that will capture a lot of people," he said. "It's a perfect buoyant entertainment to open the festival with and get it off to a good running start." To judge by early ticket sales, the film has definitely caught the public's fancy, he added.

Music is a strong theme at this year's festival. Also on offer are a Dutch-made profile of Kinky Friedman, a Jewish country rocker turned murder mystery novelist; an Israeli documentary, Taqasim, about Israeli violinist Felix Mizrahi returning to his former home in Cairo; the US-made Keep On Walking, about a Jewish-raised African-American gospel singer ("You haven't lived until you've heard a joyous gospel choir sing Adon Olam," says the film's promo); and Strange Fruit, an American documentary about the famed Billie Holiday song, which was written by Abel Meeropol, a Jewish schoolteacher from the Bronx.

Holocaust themes are also well represented. The Optimists tells the little-known story of the rescue of the Bulgarian Jews during the Holocaust. Sobibor tells of a heroic rebellion of Jewish prisoners at that concentration camp in 1943.

"Terrorists" In Retirement, made in France in 1983, tells of a controversial wartime episode in which a group of extreme anti-Nazi resistance fighters were abandoned by the resistance movement and executed by the Nazis. The Grey Zone focuses on the 12th Sonderkommando unit at Auschwitz, which revolted in 1944, destroying half of the camp's ovens.

Based on a true story, The Believer focuses on a virulent Nazi skinhead and Jew-hater who was born a Jew; it depicts much violence and racism in New York City.

"I think it's a coup for us that we were able to get the film," Schwartzberg said. "It's a really controversial film. It was supposed to be at the Toronto International Film Festival but the filmmakers pulled it out because of September 11."

If controversy is what festival organizers seek, they may have their hands full with some of the Israeli films and films about Israel on offer. The Accused, for instance, is a 46-minute British-made TV documentary that focuses on Ariel

SHE'S OFF: El Al's first female pilot, First Officer Merav Schwartz, 33, recently completed her first commercial flight for El Al from Tel Aviv to Nairobi, Kenya. Schwartz was accepted to El Al's world-renowned flight school in April 2000, after having successfully served in the Israeli Air Force, as have all El Al pilots. After more than a year of training, she was assigned to El Al's Boeing 737 fleet, which is used for regional destinations in the Mediterranean as well as throughout Europe. She hopes one day to be assigned to El Al's jumbo jet aircraft.

Controversial films included in Film Festival's lineup

Sharon's role in the Sabra and Shatilla massacres in Israeli-controlled Lebanon in 1982. Made last year, the film assigns full responsibility to Sharon for the bloodbath.

Schwartzberg defends the decision to include the film at a moment when the world seems to need no additional incitement to bash Israel or the Jews. "I think the subject is important," he said. "I don't think we should be scared of discussing anything – Israelis certainly aren't. Every subject under the sun is discussed by Israelis."

Then there's A Bomb in the Basement, a recent Israeli production that explores Israel's nuclear capabilities, with much archival footage and contributions from Shimon Peres and the Mossad's Isser Harel.

The festival is offering a number of interesting Canadian productions, such as Je Me Souviens, a Quebec-made investigation of anti-Semitism in Quebec from the 1930s to the present. There's also a retrospective track that allows festival goers to see numerous popular films from previous years. Titles include Autumn Sun, Underdogs, A Jewish Wedding, A Tickle in the Heart, and Blacks and Jews.

These are only some of over 60 films scheduled for screening during the festival, which runs from the evening of April 20 to the evening of April 28. Although no films are scheduled on Saturday April 27 during daylight hours, numerous free events have been arranged involving story tellers and Jewish learning.

The festival takes place at the Bloor Cinema, east of Bathurst. Program booklets should be available at public libraries and Cineplex Odeon theatres as of April 10. For more information or to purchase tickets or a pass, visit the web site [www.tjff.com] and click on Festival 2002, or phone 416-324-9121.

Ninth year for March of Dames

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The March of Dames – 9 Lives!, 50 women and a few honorary males, ran for its ninth season, March 20-24, at the Tim Sims Playhouse, with its usual gusto and humour.

In the funniest act, Victoria Goring, miming the song It Had to be You, didn't say one word, as she tried to put a white tablecloth under a bottle of wine, (which she drank in two glasses) and then disappeared into a big cardboard box, rooting out a new TV set and remote control, which she set up beside the wine.

More vocal, but equally humorous, were Leslie Kaz and Michelle Neilson, playing two nuns who wander through a mall, trying on form-fitting, plastic clothing that makes them so happy they end up doing a delirious dance. Before the dance, they suppress, just barely, their evident instinct to have a relationship with one of the honorary males.

Hosting March of Dames, held in aid of the Toronto Cat Rescue Society, was veteran Lisa Merchant, who with Janet Van De Graaff and Lindsay Leese, demonstrated their improv skill in acting out themes suggested by the audience.

Stella Walker, introduced as the "goddess of the oddest," sang a song dedicated to her favourite artist, "Dada." She appears often at the Yiddishland Cafe and other Jewish concerts, singing in Yiddish.

Sonja Mills did an excellent piece on a candidate for the provincial Tory leadership, outlining the kind of Ontario she had in mind, which transferred all school children to jails for their safety, while teachers joined the ranks of the unemployed.

Other performers were Katie Bergin, Lisa Brooke, Jamillah Ross, Lex Vaughn, Kristeen von Hagen and Shoshana Sperling.

Sperling's day job, as she calls it, is writing religious comedy for Vision TV, sending up stereotypes of bigots.

"I'm not making fun of religions," she said in an interview. "I'm just exposing those racists who claim they represent certain religions."

The former Regina native has lived in Toronto for 10 years. "I'm everything – an actor, a performer, a Canadian. I don"t want to be put in any category," she said.

Her latest problem is finding a new title for a play she has written, she said. For now, she has named it Regina Monologues, which everyone assumes is related to Vagina Monologues, and which, with Nightwood Theatre as co-producer, will be presented by Theatre Passe Muraille next February, under its new title.

It will open in Regina this fall. "It's about the city of Regina. It has nothing to do with vaginas," she said. "I gave it that title because it was a deadline for a festival and I had to have a name."

Canada's oldest suviving synagogue is in Victoria, B.C.

By RANDY ROWETT & KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — When you think of British Columbia's picturesque capital situated on the southern tip of Vancouver Island, high tea at the historic Fairmont Empress Hotel comes to mind.

But long before 1908 when the first teapot steeped, the Jewish Congregation Emanu-El had already been in existence for 38 years.

Still thriving today, Congregation Emanu-El, located on 1461 Blanshard St., is the oldest surviving synagogue in Canada and on the west coast of North America – originally servicing the Jews that arrived on Fort Victoria's shores in 1858 who were attracted by the Fraser River Gold Rush on the mainland.

In fact, this national historic site is one of the oldest place of continuous worship of any religion in British Columbia.

The Jewish pioneers were welcomed into Victoria's early settlement because they flourished in business, industry, politics and the arts. With its mild weather making Victoria pleasant to visit all year round, it is not surprising that these early immigrants were enticed to stay.

Even today, many Canadians fed up with the cold winter weather are looking west to Victoria instead of south to Florida to resettle or retire.

Travellers to Victoria can be kept busy for days within steps of the often-photographed Inner Harbour, home to the provincial Parliament Buildings. Attractions around the harbour include the impressive Royal British Columbia Museum which houses exhibits of the human and natural history of the province.

Adjacent to the museum is the National Geographic IMAX Theatre.

A few short blocks away is the 1860s Carr House – the birthplace of the late Emily Carr, the city's most famous artist, author and eccentric genius.

Other places of note and fun include the Crystal Garden Conservation Centre, a tropical paradise in the heart of downtown; and the Royal London Wax Museum, saluting famous and infamous figures from history, politics and entertainment.

Across the inner harbour is the Victoria Bug Zoo, full of creepy, crawly creatures that you can touch, if you really want to.

In and around the city's centre there is plenty to see, including Craigdarroch Castle, built as a status symbol by Scotsman Robert Dunsmuir after making his fortune from Vancouver Island coal.

Nearby is Oak Bay Village, a great place to stroll and shop for souvenirs.

You'll need to take a tour or rent a car, but it is well worth it to visit Sydney and the Saanich Peninsula, minutes from the airport. This small community even has its own museum.

Goldstream Provincial Park is located on traditional fishing grounds of the local First Nations. Around mid-October, for nine weeks, millions of Pacific salmon make their way up the streams of the park to spawn and die. It is a sight to see if you can stand the smell.

Most everyone that comes to the Victoria area makes a pilgrimage to the Butchart Gardens. North of Victoria, it's easy to find. Just follow the cavalcade of tourist buses up Hwy. 17 to the blooms.

In 1904, Ontario born Jennie Butchart turned her husband Robert's cement quarry into The Sunken Garden. Over the years, the family-owned business has grown with the addition of the Rose, Italian and Japanese Gardens.

There are festivities offered throughout the year. July and August bring a magnificent fireworks display every Saturday night. As you can imagine, many of The Butchart Gardens' staff have green thumbs and if you ask nicely, they will be more than willing to share tips with budding amateur gardeners.

You can be accommodated very nicely in Victoria, from the budget Accent Inns to the prestigious Fairmont Empress Hotel, where many of the antique laden rooms and suites overlook the Inner Harbour.

Other hotels in the vicinity include the Hotel Grand Pacific with its modern Japanese style spa and the four-star Chateau Victoria. Staying off the beaten path includes both Victorian and modern hotel rooms designed by architect Paul Hadfield.

If you enjoy water adventure, then the Oak Bay Beach Hotel & Marina Resort is for you. Activities include whale watching and kayaking. The Oak Bay has its own Canadian customs' office for those taking the ferry from the hotel's docks to Washington State.

Approximately 45 minutes southwest of Victoria is Sooke Harbour House. According to present day owners' Sinclair & Frederica Philip, this luxury country inn with 28 exquisitely designed guest rooms served as a safe house for Jewish refugees during World War 11.

Travel Agency offers affordable Family Bar/Bat Mitzvah Tours to Europe

Peerless Travel is one of North America's largest Jewish travel agencies, and Canada's largest. Of 60,000 clients served in 2000, 9,000 traveled to Israel. The other 51,000 comprised corporate and business travelers and leisure travelers taking cruises and vacation packages to southern sun destinations. Peerless offers worldwide discounted airfares, hotels & car packages, specialty travel groups, and much more.

Following its' success operating one of the best North American family Bar/Bat Mitzvah tour programs to Israel, Peerless is now offering families Bar/Bat Mitzvah tours to Europe, based on the same model of success (details below). Most of Peerless' business is return customers and referrals. "Our best advertising" says Peerless president Ehud Telem, "is praise from clients."

Peerless prides itself on quality tours. Their educational and cultural value is enormous - both for what you see, and the quality of the guides. And the value is great. Peerless family tours to Israel and Europe offer more dollar value than any tour offered by anyone in North America!!!

Peerless also prides itself on respecting scheduled tour departure dates no matter the group size. Visits to certain sites may vary, however, the Bar/Bat Mitzvah ceremony at Masada is always a highlight. What setting could be more moving for such an auspicious occasion?

Friendly, courageous, full of vitality, Israel's people represent a kaleidoscope of cultures and languages, making this the most exciting country on earth. Israel isn't only a cradle of history: it's a mosaic of present-day humanity.

Tour itineraries are unique and incorporate adult/family activities. Many evenings feature theme dinners. Imagine spending an evening in the Old City of Jerusalem at the Cardo Culinaria, site of a Roman market, eating Roman-style food and enjoying entertainment. In the spirit of the evening, everyone dons a toga, helmets and shields. Another evening may feature a dinner/dance by the beautiful Sea of Galilee. Many meals are enjoyed outdoors on terraces.

Compare this with a Bar or Bat Mitzvah held in your home city. Booking your venue up to three years in advance, you begin organizing details at least six months ahead; in a short evening's time, you've spent more than a tour could cost for your family. Try the Peerless alternative, sparing you work and worry; you can even book a tour at the last minute if space is still available.

A Peerless Bar/Bat mitzvah family tour is all inclusive, featuring luxury accommodation; it's hassle-free, and worry-free. Every detail of your tour is looked after; all scheduling is done for you and nothing interferes with your family having a great time. You'll love the many exciting activities planned - jeep tours and white water rafting are just a couple.

Trip extensions and side trips to Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Morocco, Jordan, and Mediterranean Cruises are offered. Currently being organized is a second solidarity tour to Israel, May 19-28, led by Beth David's Rabbi Philip Scheim and Beth Emeth's Rabbi Howard Morrison.

Why Europe? Already visited Israel? Europe offers a rich and exciting tapestry of Jewish life. Stretching over 2000 years of exile, Jewish life has left an indelible mark, especially in central Europe. Many "second timers" have asked Peerless to develop a European tour based on the agency's vast experience acquired over years operating family tours.

The Europe family Bar/Bat Mitzvah tour is operated in the same style and on the same principles as the Israel family tours. All inclusive, luxury accommodations, no worry, no hassle, all needs looked after, with minimal out of pocket expense. A tour escort guides your family, attending to your needs, and as required, provides an expert English-speaking local guide.

Your family will enjoy a varied multitude of general interest sights and family actvities i.e. Hungary's Puszta Horse Show and Milan's Sforza Museum with its famous musical instrument collection. You'll also visit old Jewish districts and sites in Prague, Budapest, Venice and Vienna. And the highlight, the Bar/Bat mitzvah ceremony for your son or daughter will be held in a beautiful old Vienna synagogue where each child will be honored with an aliyah and read a Torah portion.

Tour expenses include entrance fees to sites and activities outlined in the itinerary; transfers, including to restaurants outside the hotel; daily breakfast; 13 dinners including welcome, farewell and Bar/Bat Mitzvah dinner; two lunches; Bar/Bat Mitzvah ceremony; taxes; service charges; airport and hotel porterage; and gratuities to hotel staff and outside restaurant staff. Two Europe Family Bar/Bat Mitzvah Tours are planned for this summer - July 7-21 and August 4-18.

Business Profile

Holocaust survivor rises to top of bakery business

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Shortly after the Buchenwald concentration camp in Germany was liberated by the U.S. army in 1945, Max Feig, one of its starving, disease-ridden inmates, saw loaves of bread literally falling from a clear sky.

To Feig, a Czech Jew who survived the Holocaust by the skin of his teeth, the bread, dropped by American aircraft, was like manna from heaven.

Little did he know that bread – the staff of life – would figure prominently in his own life later on.

In 1953, soon after his arrival in Toronto by way of Israel, Feig started working as a driver for Crown Bread Bakery on Augusta Street.

He needed the job to supplement his income as a seasonal bricklayer.

Feig learned bricklaying in Israel, where he and his family – wife Rose and daughter Pearl – lived from 1948 until their immigration to Canada..

Having concluded that the baking business was a promising one for a hard-working, ambitious man who didn't mind interminable hours, Feig and fellow door-to-door delivery man, Emil Friedman, decided to open their own bakery.

Max Feig co-founded Open Window Bakery in 1957

In tandem with two other partners, Leslie Kellerman, a bread baker, and Louis Friedman, a cake baker, they founded Open Window Bakery.

It blossomed into one of Toronto's biggest bakeries.

The partners opened their first store on Bathurst Street on Jan. 7, 1957.

Within a few years, Open Window shops were popping up all over town, vindicating Feig's belief in the bakery business.

Forty five years on – Open Window stores treated its customers to free refreshments to mark the anniversary – Feig presides over a small empire whose tantalizing fare is sold as far west as Hamilton and as far east as Oshawa.

In a massive plant on Finch Avenue West, workers pump out an array of breads, bagels, rolls, buns, croissants, pastries and cakes.

A jumble of giant ovens, rollers, mixers, steam rooms, walk-in refrigerators, flour-dusted tables, silos, stainless steel bowls and bulky flour bags, the plant hums with activity 24 hours a day.

Having bought out his partners years ago, Feig is president of the company. His daughter, Gail Agasi, is vice-president.

Feig's two other children, Pearl and Edith, have pursued different interests.

His sister's son-in-law, Yacov, manages the cake department, while his son-in-law, Gabor, is an Open Window salesperson.

Altogether, Feig employs a staff of about 200 people, some of whom have been with him for decades.

As he walked around the plant, giving a reporter a tour, he cordially greeted workers and stopped briefly to chat with them.

At one point, Open Window had more than 30 stores, counting the Health Bread Bakery franchise, which Feig folded into the business in 1975.

But in recent years, he closed stores – there are 12 today, four of which Feig owns outright – and began selling to grocery chains like Loblaws, Longo's and Highland Farm.

"Business used to be much, much better," he said, in tones redolent of Eastern Europe.

"Now the competition is very big. Today there are more bakeries. On every corner, I see a bagel bakery."

As a result, Feig had no alternative but to seek out chain stores. He estimates that as much as 70 per cent of his baked goods are sold to stores such as Loblaws and Longo's.

Feig, who turned 81 recently, was born in Luh, a small town in the Carpathian Mountains in Czechoslovakia. He was the fourth oldest of eight children.

Ignatz (Yitzhak), his father, was a cattle dealer. Gita, his mother, was a seamstress.

There were approximately 40 Jewish families in Luh, which was mainly inhabited by ethnic Ukrainians.

Hungary, an ally of Germany, occupied Luh after the outbreak of World War II. Pressed into a labour battalion, Feig was sent to Yugoslavia.

Max Feig and daughter Gail Agasi.

Considering the terrible fate that befell many other Jews, Feig's treatment was relatively humane.

But things took a sharp turn for the worse after he was shipped to a succession of concentration camps in Germany: Ordruf, Flossenburg and, finally, Buchenwald.

He was very sick in Buchenwald with a case of typhoid.

He could not have survived the ordeal without the help of his younger brother, Sam, who now lives in Detroit.

Three of his sisters – Sima, Rifka and Shana – also lived through the Holocaust.

But his parents, as well as three of his siblings, including older brother Herman, perished.

After being liberated, Feig returned to Luh, but there was nothing there for him, so he left.

Being a Zionist, Feig went to Israel, settling on a farm near Zichron Yacov.

Conditions were hard.

Like many newly arrived Jews of that era, he and his family dwelled in a simple shack.

"I had to leave Israel because my wife couldn't take the heat," he explained.

And, Feig added, he was none too happy on a farm.

He had much better luck in Toronto.

For the first few years after launching Open Window, he drove a delivery truck. Then he was a salesperson.

Surprisingly, perhaps, Feig was never a baker, leaving the baking to seasoned pros.

"I had no knowledge of baking," he said.

Feig, a member and benefactor of B'nai Brith, has slowed down since being stricken with health problems. Within a five-year period, he had two bypass heart operations.

Although he feels better these days, he has not resumed his old punishing pace, and now usually puts in a six-hour day.

But he has no intention of stepping down any time soon and intends to stay as long as his health permits.

"If I retire, what will I do?" he asked plaintively.

Baycrest Centre celebrates Passover big time

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Planning to whip up a batch of chicken soup and kneidlach for 1,000 guests? Donna Gates has the perfect recipe.

She can also provide hints for making meat loaf, or for Passover, a matzah farfel kugel for those same 1,000 people.

As director of food and nutrition services at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Gates oversees the production of these favourites plus many other kosher, nutritious and tasty dishes.

Baycrest kitchen staff – there are 260 employees, 120 of whom are full time – work in shifts from 5:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. in one of the largest kosher kitchens in North America.

Rabbi Berlat

Under the watchful eye of mashgiach Nachman Wilhelm, they prepare about 1,300 meals daily. This includes meals for residents, for the centre's cafeteria and for people who receive Meals on Wheels or require kosher meals in other facilities.

Residents who have a concern or question about the meals, or have a recipe idea to submit, can go to Baycrest's food committee – it includes residents – which meets every four to six weeks to plan meals and "every so often" to do a menu review, Gates says.

"Recipes are developed by the committee, and we bring in residents to do taste tests. Everything is very democratic," she says."

When thoughts of Passover were still on most people's back burners, Gates says, members of Baycrest's kitchen staff were cleaning, preparing and planning menus.

"Our Passover period began Jan. 2 when we ordered grocery items such as matzah products and canned goods from U.S. distributors. Perishables such as meat, poultry and produce were bought locally, closer to Passover," she says.

Also on the shopping list is equipment such as aluminum pans and chemicals for cleaning the kitchen for Passover, a job that began at the end of January.

Up to and including Passover, staff spend more than 1,000 extra hours on special cleaning, with the work extending well past midnight on some days, says Gates. "At the end of this, the counters shine, sparkle and sing, and the rubber gloves are worn, torn and ragged."

A few days before Passover, all food is served on paper plates and all meals are dairy, which allows the kitchen staff to transfer the regular dishes into storage and the Passover dishes into use, she says.

Thinking ahead to next year's farfel kugel?

To prepare for 1,000 people you'll need: 75 kg of farfel; 35 kg of eggs; 30 kg of frozen apple slices; eight 16-litre cans of apple juice; 710 ml of lemon juice; 4 kg of sugar; 5 kg of raisins, 17 litres each of applesauce and canned pineapple; 1 kg of matzah meal; and 1 litre of cooking oil.

To prepare the kneidlach for 150 litres of chicken soup stock, you'll need 50 dozen eggs, 6 litres of water, four litres of cooking oil, 260 grams of salt, 17 kg of matzah meal and six 75-litre bottles of club soda.

If you plan on making meat loaf, you may want to start by calling your butcher and pre-ordering 54 kg of minced beef.

"[Passover] is a huge undertaking, but when we see clients and family enjoying our seders, it makes all the work worthwhile. It's very moving to see how emotional some people become.

"I see them all year, and when I see them at the seder, they are so much more alive and happy," Gates says.

Baycrest's seders included a hospital seder for clients and their families, a seder for Apotex Centre residents and a seder for Baycrest Terrace residents.

Included in the seder menu was gefilte fish; chicken soup with kneidlach; braised brisket, roast chicken or boiled chicken; matzah farfel kugel or mashed potatoes; tzimmes; and stewed apricots and sponge cake.

Rabbi Norman Berlat, Baycrest's director of pastoral care, says Passover is of great significance to the Baycrest community.

"It brings to mind by-gone Passovers and that usually brings positive, warm, moving memories. Because about one-third of our residents are Holocaust survivors, Passover might bring memories of anti-Semitism and of the ghettos and concentration camps. They remember the efforts they went to just to have matzah. Their faith helped them survive.

"It is also seen as a time of homecoming. Many residents go home to their families, while others have their families join them here for our seders. In any case, we try to make it joyous and meaningful for them."

The anticipation begins weeks before the holiday, says Rabbi Berlat. "Our goal at Baycrest is to enrich residents' lives and make things as normal as possible for them. This is their home, and we want it to feel that way."

Sofiya Shapiro, food service aide in the Baycrest Centre kitchen, prepares soup for Passover. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

It is also important to include the outside community in their observances, he says. "At least 25 per cent of the people at our synagogue services come from the general community, and we encourage people to bring their children. They have become part of our extended Baycrest family."

People who live nearby also come by with bags of chametz for the annual chametz burning ceremony, he said.

Israel & the Jewish World

As intifadah rages on, anti-Jewish acts in France continue

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — France's Jewish community has seen a wave of anti-Jewish attacks since the beginning of the Palestinian intifadah more than 18 months ago. Arson has hit synagogues and Jewish institutions. Pedestrians who look Jewish have been attacked. Police have fielded hundreds of complaints lodged by Jews about threats and abusive language. Defamatory graffiti messages in Jewish neighbourhoods have included: "Dirty Jews," "Jews to the gas chamber," "Jews! Prepare for an intifadah in France" and "Death to Jews."

The attacks continued last weekend, as the violence escalated in the Middle East. There were fires at a synagogue in southeastern Lyon and in the eastern city of Strasbourg, and a fire destroyed a synagogue in the southern city of Marseille, police said. There were no injuries reported at the latter fire, which broke out late Sunday night, shortly after police had completed a patrol of the synagogue as part of intensified security measures recently put in place at Jewish religious sites.

Also on Sunday, a gunman opened fire on a kosher butcher shop near Toulouse, in southern France. The owner was inside at the time of the attack but was unharmed.

And Le Journal du Dimanche, a Sunday newspaper, reported that a Jewish couple in their 20s suffered injuries from an attack Saturday afternoon in the town of Villeurbanne, in the Rhone region. The woman, who was said to be pregnant, was reportedly hospitalized overnight.

Though French authorities have tracked down suspects in only a handful of cases, they have established a clear pattern: the vandalism, abuse and attacks have often been perpetrated by youths from Arab families that immigrated to France from North Africa. These Arabs, they believe, consider attacks against French Jews a way to protest Israel's policies toward Palestinians.

Arabs in France have mobilized in support of the Palestinians in the territories, and local Jews have rallied in support of Israel. During past conflicts between Israelis and Palestinians, French citizens of Arab origin did not respond as they have throughout this current intifadah; they did not attack Jews or Jewish institutions.

The recent wave of Jew hatred that has swept through France has stirred fear and concern among local Jews. Hundreds of anti-Semitic incidents have spurred responses among leaders of France's organized Jewish community.

"This is worse than random acts of violence," says Haim Musicant, director of CRIF, an umbrella organization of French Jewish groups. He views the acts as a sustained intimidation and incitement campaign aimed at frightening French Jews who support Israel.

"For the first time since the Holocaust, synagogues have been burned, and calls of 'death to the Jews' have been heard," he adds. "It is no wonder that members of Jewish communities around France were alarmed, and came to us for help. True, up to now there have been no fatalities, but Jews have been injured, as have their cultural symbols."

Two candidates for the French presidency have taken positions on a variety of domestic issues while saying little about the attacks against Jews.

The two, President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin, originally told Jewish community leaders to show fortitude and try to calm their memberships. With the elections weeks away, both have been wary of alienating the Arab vote. Some five million people of North African ancestry live in France.

But after attacks against Jews multiplied, the two candidates inserted into their speeches statements designed to allay apprehensions. They also issued orders for stiff enforcement of the law against perpetrators of the attacks.

Meanwhile, CRIF president Roger Cukierman has issued an urgent appeal to French authorities, calling on them to put an end to the attacks.

"We want to prevent a situation from arising in which Muslim hatred joins forces with anti-Semitism of the extreme right," Cukierman said recently in a speech delivered at CRIF's annual conference.

Public opinion polls suggest that sympathies in France tend to lie with the Palestinians. A majority of respondents expressed support for the Palestinian aspiration to establish a state, and have said they view the Palestinians' current struggle as a legitimate expression of the demand for national liberation. A year after Israel elected Ariel Sharon prime minister, many French people continue to harbour deep misgivings about him.

Presidential candidate François Bayrou, who recently visited Israel, believes the attacks lack the anti-Semitic component of the Christian attacks against Jews in Europe. "This is definitely a form of protest undertaken by Muslims against their [Jews'] way of life in France," he said.

At press time, police had not yet commented on the cause of the Marseille fire, which destroyed all of the synagogue's books and religious scrolls.

The same synagogue, located in the middle of a housing project in the Mediterranean port city, was the target of an attack last October, when assailants hurled a Molotov cocktail at it.

In the four other attacks last weekend, the synagogues suffered minor damage, mostly to their facades, and there were no injuries.

Or Chaim wins its division at hoops tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Or Chaim Knights rode strong defensive play and effective shooting near the basket to a championship win in Tier III competition at the 11th annual Red Sarachek Yeshiva University Basketball Tournament last month in New York City.

The Knights finished the competition with a 4-1 record, losing only to eventual Tier II champions MTA of New York. Other than that 50-23 shocker, Or Chaim handled itself well, shutting down opponents' top scorers and getting important baskets at key times, said David Dayan, team manager.

The Knights had no problem with teams from some of the smaller schools, beating Block Yeshiva of St. Louis handily but getting a scare from Maimonides of Brookline, Mass.

Or Chaim trailed Maimonides by 12 points in the third quarter, but clawed its way back in the final minutes to win 39-36.

In the semi-final, Yeshiva High School of Boca Raton, Fla., played them tough, but Or Chaim came on to win a see-saw contest, 42-37.

The championship final saw them tip off against Northwest Yeshiva of Seattle, Wash. Or Chaim took the lead and never looked back. Although the final score was 45-42 and Northwest made a little run in the second quarter, the Knights shut them down and were never really threatened.

"We pretty much played better all the way through," Dayan said.

Knights co-captain Eli Goldberg, a point guard, was named Tier III most valuable player.

Altogether, 18 teams from across North America participated in the tournament. Magen David of Brooklyn, N.Y., defeated Ramaz of New York City to capture first place in Tier I.

Or Chaim Knights celebrate winning the Tier III event at New York tournement.

Ramaz recently won the Israel Becker Tournament hosted by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Or Chaim, which won Division III at the Israel Becker event, was the only Canadian entry in New York. The tournament is named for Yeshiva University's long time men's basketball coach, Red Sarachek.

"It's the premier yeshiva high school basketball tournament in the country," said Michael Kranzler, director of admissions at Yeshiva University. "Over the years, we've had the top Jewish high school teams playing."

The Or Chaim Knights include: Goldberg, Dayan, Avi Silverman, Daniel Magder, Daniel Gutenberg, Yudi Greenberg (co-captain), Zev Rapp, Gabi Leventhal, Moshe Klein, David Elmaleh, Yonah Krakowski, Ilan Ulmer and Menachem Salmon. The team is coached by Mike Blatchford, and Peter Salmon served as chaperone.

Sprinter may be today's top Jewish athlete

By SCOTT GRANOWITZ
Special to The CJN

BOSTON — When today's top Jewish athletes are considered, the names Shawn Green, Jay Fiedler, Kerri Strug, Lenny Krayzelburg and Mathieu Schneider come readily to mind. All are great athletes who compete primarily in North America.

But if you were to look outside the continent, a different name would no doubt top the list. Based on last year's performance, the top Jewish athlete – perhaps anywhere – is Zhanna Pintusevich-Block.

Pintusevich-Block, a 29-year-old native of Kiev, Ukraine, ran the biggest race of her career in August at the 2001 World Championships in Edmonton.

It will go down as perhaps the biggest upset ever by a Jewish athlete. Pintusevich-Block shocked the world by ending the streak of 42 consecutive final-race victories in the 100-metres by American superstar and Sydney gold medalist Marion Jones. Pintusevich-Block's time of 10.82 in the final was the fastest time of the year by any woman.

Pintusevich-Block burst onto the world track & field scene more than four years ago at the World Championships in Athens. It was there that she ran a then personal best of 10.85 seconds in a memorable 100-metre photo finish loss to Jones (10.83). Although her forte is the 100-metres, later that summer, Pintusevich-Block added a gold medal in the 200.

Pintusevich-Block came out of the blocks fast, and held off a surging Jones at the finish line to win by three-hundredths of a second. It was truly a dream come true after coming so close in 1997 when she and many spectators thought she had won. (Her victory lap celebration was cut short by the officials). Known primarily as a world-class finisher, it was her much improved start out of the blocks that led to the upset.

Her coach Mark Block, who also happens to be her husband, helped greatly in that area. Block is world-renowned for helping sprinters get fast starts in their races.

A former coach at Clemson University and University of California -Berkeley who now earns a living as a track & field agent for Flynn Sports Management, Block had reservations about combining the coach-wife relationship. But after a disappointing Sydney Olympics in which she finished fifth in the 100 metres and eighth in the 200, Pintusevich-Block left her former coach Valentine Bondarenko to form a different kind of marriage with Mark.

The two practised starts everywhere, including their home.

"She did come close to breaking furniture in the living room as we do not have much room," quipped the 37-year-old Block, who mentions Zhanna's "discipline and the ability to work very hard" as her best qualities.

Mark and Zhanna met at the 1993 World Championships in Stuttgart, Germany. Zhanna (nee Tarnopolskaya) at the time was married to Igor Pintusevich, a European-class Jewish hurdler whom she competed alongside for the Soviet Union going back to the 1991 Junior European Championships, where she won gold.

It wasn't love at first sight for Mark and Zhanna – the two didn't start dating until months after her divorce from Pintusevich in 1997. These days the two live outside the Flynn Sports Management offices in Johnson City, Tenn., where Zhanna trains half the year when not competing on the world circuit.

Mark's Jewish heritage is something that puts Pintusevich-Block at ease with herself and the upbringing she had in her beloved Kiev.

"I feel we share many things that we would not otherwise," said Pintusevich-Block about the importance of marrying a Jewish man.

"Our thinking is very similar and our values are very similar. It is also amazing for two people who grew up in such different places [to see] how much in common we have. This we both believe is because of our Jewish upbringing – not just in a religious way."

Pintusevich-Block, who competes under the Ukrainian flag, believes she has the chance to participate in "at least one more Olympics, and [there's] a good chance I can go beyond that."

If she does, she will begin approximating the success of Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska, the legendary Jewish-Polish sprinter who set world records in the 100, 200, and 400-metre events in the 1960s and 1970s.

Already the Kirszenstein and Tarnopolskaya families share certain features. The Kirszenstein family escaped Nazi concentration camps in Poland by running off to Russia, while Pintusevich-Block's mother was sent to Siberia as a child during the Soviet persecution of Jews.

If the family histories carry through, one day Pintusevich-Block may be as accomplished an athlete as her Polish-born counterpart. And sports fans might even recognize she has a legitimate place at or near the top of a list of the best Jewish athletes of today.

It's time for honesty on Mideast

When it comes to Israel, Canada's good-cop-bad-cop routine is becoming tiresome. Brand new Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, poor sap, is sent out to rebuke Israel in front of the Canada-Israel Committee, in a speech that was no doubt approved by the Prime Minister's Office, while the prime minister says Canada stands "shoulder to shoulder" with the Jewish state.

This is like bopping someone on the head and then offering him an Aspirin.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

It's useful to look back to the Brian Mulroney era, when the differences between Mulroney and his foreign minister, Joe Clark, were real and palpable, and the two clashed frequently and publicly on Mideast policy.

At the end of the day, though, as Mulroney was practically forced to put it at the height of the first intifadah, "it is the prime minister who speaks for Canada."

Well, let's hear it then.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's bland platitudes about this country's support for Israel will be empty and meaningless unless he's willing to abandon his inoffensive, Lester Pearson-era fence-sitting and use some of the backbone he's hinted at in Afghanistan.

I fear that's not likely to happen. I've interviewed Chrétien several times and noticed something I've never told anyone before. While he's informed and animated, and even charming, on national unity, the economy and other big issues, nothing alters his demeanor and body language like the Middle East. Bring up Israel and the Palestinians, and it's as though he's suddenly donned a hair shirt, shifting uncomfortably, eyes darting about and reciting a script written by foreign affairs minions. His disastrous trip to Israel two years ago spoke volumes.

Am I being unfair? I don't think so. The gloves have been off for a long time in the Middle East (maybe they were never on) and it's time for some boldness, let alone honesty.

Chrétien can start by paying heed to an unprecedented public request from Israel to Canada that we run interference at the current annual fiasco (read meeting) of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, now taking place in Geneva.

As reported in last week's CJN, Israel has asked Canada (in the absence of the United States, which some thuggish regimes succeeded in kicking off the commission) to try to force recorded votes of the five anti-Israel resolutions expected to pass, at least to avoid the appearance that the measures were endorsed unanimously.

(It was on the meeting's opening day that the ambassador from Algeria, of all places, said that every night in the Palestinian territories is like Kristallnacht. You get the idea.)

It should be noted that Canada has done a lot of positive behind-the-scenes work on the Middle East, including helping to end Israel's isolation at the UN. Canada also stayed until the bitter end of the UN anti-racism conference and helped blunt a lot of the vitriolic language – and even dissociated itself from parts of the final communiqué.

But Canada has also censured Israel for applying excessive force against Palestinians; has supported, or abstained from, a slew of smaller, but no less scurrilous, anti-Israel UN measures; and backed a declaration that accused Israel of "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions – at the very time Canada itself faced accusations that it was violating the same conventions by handing Taliban and Al Qaeda prisoners over to a non-neutral country (the United States).

Good cop, bad cop.

Someone should also tell UN Secretary General Kofi Annan that Israel's occupation of territories captured in 1967 isn't illegal, as he said last week. Perhaps that isn't Canada's place, but someone should tell him.

A seismic shift in Canada's position on Israel is needed now more than ever. But don't expect the Earth to move any time soon.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

The recent decision of the Ontario government to grant a refundable education tax credit to parents of children in independent schools has raised the issue of accountability. Can the government grant a tax credit to parents without some assurance that the education offered in these independent schools is valid? One would think that such assurance is an obvious requirement and a fairly simple task.

Things educational, however, are never that simple. A few points:

• This particular form of government aid to private education is coming from the Ministry of Finance, not the Ministry of Education. It is a tax credit to parents, not curriculum funding to schools.

• The raison d'être of faith-based schools is a curriculum different from the public system's. In some cases, that translates into mere additions to the general course of study, but in many schools, either the pedagogic approach or the religious ideology affects the global curriculum. That can be just as true of a Montessori school as it is of a chassidic one.

• Some educators and many laymen assume that educational progress can be measured accurately and quantified precisely. While that may be true, comparing the results of such testing from school to school or even from child to child is dangerous and misleading. Each school, like each student, is unique. Now that we embrace the notion of multiple intelligences, standardized testing is seriously brought into question.

I am pleased that the tax credit has forced us to confront accountability. As it happens, I do not think the government has a need to request curricular accountability with regard to this credit. The regulations demand certain things of participating schools and are both fair and sufficient. However, Jewish day schools should be accountable to their own parent bodies. In an open school market, parents can determine if a particular school is living up to its own values, curricular content and pedagogic approach. That is a much more realistic and user-friendly accountability than one which attempts to compare a unique learning environment to a central model quite remote and unconnected.

The more schools define their own goals and values, and the more parents are involved in that process, the more integrity our Jewish education will have. This is an inner accountability that leads to learning both authentic to our traditions and relevant to our future.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Mount Sinai Researchers DREAM

AN INTERNATIONAL STUDY IN THE PREVENTION OF TYPE 2 DIABETES

Researchers at Mount Sinai are looking for people to participate in an international study called DREAM. This study will examine the occurrence of Type 2 diabetes in people who are most likely to develop the condition. "Preventing diabetes means we may also prevent the serious health consequences of diabetes. Diabetes is the major cause of blindness, kidney failure, and leg amputation worldwide. It is also a common cause of heart disease and stroke," says Dr. Bernard Zinman, Director of Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes, Sam and Judy Pencer and Family Chair in Diabetes Research.

What is diabetes?

Diabetes is a disease that prevents your pancreas from producing enough insulin to meet your body's needs. Insulin regulates your body's glucose (sugar) levels. Without enough insulin, the glucose levels in your blood rise. Diabetes is diagnosed when your blood glucose level is seven or higher after not eating for at least eight hours.

Why is diabetes a problem?

It is estimated that 1.5 million people suffer from diabetes in Canada and that by the year 2016 there will be another million people afflicted with this disease. We are facing an epidemic of diabetes. Incidence of the disease is increasing dramatically due to factors such as:

- the aging baby boomer population
- society becoming increasingly obese and sedentary

Who is at risk?

You are at risk if any of the following apply to you:

- there is a history of diabetes in your family
- you are of Native North American, Latin American, African, Asian or Hispanic descent
- you have given birth to a baby that weighed over 9 lbs.
- you had previous diabetes in pregnancy (gestational diabetes)
- you have had previous high or borderline blood sugar levels
- your blood pressure is high
- you are overweight

Who can take part in the study?

You can take part in the study if:

- you are at least 30 years old
- you DO NOT presently have diabetes
- you are not pregnant and not planning on becoming pregnant for the next five years

Are there any medications?

Yes. This clinical trial is testing the effectiveness of two medications - ramipril and/or rosiglitazone - in reducing the risk of a person developing Type 2 diabetes. Both medications are extensively used for other purposes. Evidence from preliminary studies has shown that both drugs are safe and may prevent diabetes.

How long will this study last?

If you are interested in taking part in this study, you will be seen regularly by a research team during the next three to five years.

Pro-Israel forces rally in France

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — Demonstrators took to the streets of Paris and other French cities Sunday to express their solidarity with Israel and protest against a wave of anti-Jewish violence as tensions flared in the Middle East.

Waving Israeli flags and draped in the blue and white colours of the national banner, protesters marched from the Place de la République to the Place de la Bastille in Paris, chanting in French and Hebrew and carrying signs that read "Yesterday New York, today Jerusalem, tomorrow Paris."

Organizers estimated the turnout at 150,000, although eyewitnesses put it at between 20,000 and 30,000. Police said another 8,000 pro-Israel protesters were marching in Lyon, 4,000 in Marseille and 2,500 in Strasbourg.

French news channel LCI reported that a police officer in Paris had suffered a knife wound in the abdomen at the hands of a young member of a radical Jewish organization. A demonstrator in Marseille reportedly suffered a knife injury to the thigh.

The demonstrations came against a backdrop of heightened tensions in the Middle East. The violence there has stirred strong emotions in France, which has large Arab and Jewish communities, and coincided with a series of attacks on Jewish targets in the country.

The pro-Israel demonstrations also came a day after about a dozen pro-Palestinian marches were held in cities across France.

UJA federations launch emergency Israel campaign

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is joining a $300-million (US) North American emergency fund-raising campaign for Israel that it helped to establish.

The emergency fund-raising drive, announced by United Jewish Communities, the umbrella organization for North American Jewish federations, will support social service programs in Israel, which have been strained to the limit by reduced government funding and the cost of terror relief.

"The need for programs to serve Israel's most vulnerable is increasing dramatically as government resources are necessarily diverted to security; the cost of long-term terror relief increases with each blast," said Howard Sokolowski, who is chairing the emergency campaign in Toronto and UJA Federation Campaign 2003, with Ronnie Appleby.

$300 million (US) target for North America

"With thousands of IDF reservists called up, Israeli families and the entire country are suffering further economic hardship, so these emergency fund-raising dollars will make a major difference," Appleby added. "Our message to Israel loudly and clearly is that 'we're with you.'"

The new campaign follows UJA Federation 2002 campaign, which is expected to raise $50 million (Cdn).

A UJA Federation of Greater Toronto leadership delegation is now in Israel on a fact-finding mission.

In conjunction with the Israel Now Consortium, UIA Federations Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is formulating a plan that involves more missions to Israel, events on Israel's behalf, educational forums and contacts with both the media and Canadian parliamentarians.

UJA Federation has sent nearly 1,000 people to Israel on monthly missions since September 2000.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Rabbi

CALGARY — Temple B'nai Tikvah will have a new rabbi beginning in September. The Reform synagogue's board announced recently that Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman, currently assistant rabbi at North Shore Congregation Israel in Glencoe, Ill. and a former labour lawyer, will assume the pulpit in time for the High Holy Days.

ISRAEL

Bogus Bills

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops found stashes of counterfeit shekels and dollars, as well as plates to print money, inside Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Ramallah headquarters, say Israeli officials. According to Justice Minister Meir Sheetrit, Arafat is responsible for printing several million dollars and shekels in fake money, which could have been used to undermine Israel's already shaky economy. Other officials said the money could have been used to pay Palestinian terrorists operating in Israel.

IDF Sends Food

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defense Force said last week that it supplied provisions to besieged Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. The provisions included 66 containers of yellow cheese, 13 cans of hummus, 34 crates of mineral water and 40 cans of halvah.

WORLD

Activist's Suicide

TOKYO — A pro-Palestinian activist here committed suicide last week by lighting himself on fire. Takao Himori killed himself in a Tokyo park to protest Israeli policies, a fellow activist said. Himori was a member of a group known as Voice, which has held hunger strikes and vigils in support of Palestinians.

Shul Firebombed

BRUSSELS — Vandals firebombed a synagogue here last week, causing damage inside but no injuries. Eyewitnesses quoted by Reuters said two areas of the building on the first floor were slightly damaged by fire, which burned the floor and some benches, but did not harm any holy books. Police were posted around the clock at the synagogue in Brussels' Anderlecht district following the March 31 attack.

Death Threats

NEW YORK — The Brooklyn family of a Jewish activist who supports Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat says it is getting death threats. The family of Adam Shapiro says it has received calls calling Shapiro a traitor, and threatening to kill him and his family. Shapiro, who was in Arafat's Ramallah headquarters when it was taken over by Israeli forces, has been an outspoken member of a pro-Palestinian group.

Regrets Pardon

NEW YORK — Former U.S. president Bill Clinton told Newsweek magazine that he regrets pardoning Jewish billionaire financier Marc Rich. Rich fled the United States to Switzerland in 1983 after he had been indicted on 51 counts of tax evasion, racketeering and violating trade sanctions with Iraq. His presidential pardon "was terrible politics," Clinton said. "It wasn't worth the damage to my reputation. But that doesn't mean the attacks were true."

Drive for Jews

AUCKLAND — New Zealand's Jewish community has launched a campaign to attract foreign Jews. The drive is aimed at Jews from poor countries and emphasizes New Zealand's high standard of living, economic stability and security. The nation's population of 3.7 million includes some 4,700 Jews.

Durban 'Disgraceful'

CAPE TOWN — The South African government has condemned the anti-Semitism at an anti-racism conference last summer as "disgraceful." The conference by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in Durban last August took place just before a high-profile United Nations conference against racism. Aziz Pahad, South Africa's deputy minister for foreign affairs, said Muslim activists had "taken over" the Durban NGO meeting and turned it into an anti-Semitic event.

Government Issues Israel Travel Warning

OTTAWA — The federal government has advised Canadians to "defer" tourist travel to all Israel, the West Bank and Gaza because of the risk of terrorist attacks.

Canadians travelling on business "should evaluate carefully the implications for their security and safety before deciding to travel to Israel due to the risk of further terrorist activity," the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade says.

Canadians in Israel "should avoid crowded places when at all possible due to this increased risk," the statement cautions. "Downtown Jerusalem near the intersection of Jaffa and King George streets as well as the adjoining Ben Yehuda Pedestrian Mall are particularly high risk areas."

Canadians should also avoid "large gatherings, crowded places, and proximity to other possible targets, including pedestrian promenades, shopping malls, open markets, restaurants, discotheques, bus stations, and public buses. The Lebanese border area should be avoided."

Canadians are strongly urged to stay away from the West Bank and Gaza. Canadians already there "should leave."

Community buildings struck by vandals

Toronto JCC, Reena, Saskatoon, Ottawa shuls attacked

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Jewish community buildings in Ottawa and Toronto were targeted by vandals last week with graffiti linked to the Middle East conflict, while in Saskatoon, the Agudas Israel Synagogue was struck by a firebomb that caused $130,000 worth of damage.

"Palestine," "Iran" and "MEM" were scrawled on the walls of Reena, a non-profit agency that serves developmentally disabled adults in Thornhill, north of Toronto, while Temple Israel in Ottawa was spray-painted with "All the oppressors must die" and "Israel is a terrorist state." The Miles S. Nadal Bloor Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto was also struck.

The graffiti left staff at Reena shaken and the agency's clients were agitated at the tense atmosphere and the presence of police investigating the incident, said Minnie Ross, head of communications for the agency.

"We were very surprised they would have targeted Reena, as we have no affiliation with events in the Middle East," she said.

While 60 per cent of the organization's clients are Jewish, "we just go about our business helping the developmentally disabled," she said.

In Ottawa, Rabbi Steven Garten said Temple Israel's congregation is concerned over its security.

He said he had received calls of support from clergymen he works with in interfaith dialogue and the Anglican bishop of Ottawa has sent a letter of support. But no other religious leaders had contacted him. He was particularly critical of the silence of the Muslim community's religious leader.

"We are saddened that the Imam of Ottawa at this moment has not spoken out against it. The rabbis were quick after Sept. 11 to indicate vandalism of Islamic facilities was unacceptable," Rabbi Garten said.

In Saskatoon, a flammable substance was thrown through a broken window into a classroom that was being used to temporarily store hundreds of religious and secular texts. Police and fire were called by the company monitoring the shul's alarm system. No other parts of the building were affected and Shabbat services were held the next morning in the sanctuary.

"We thought it was important to send a message to anybody who did this that we wouldn't be dissuaded from our activities," said synagogue spokesman Grant Scharfstein.

Bar and bat mitzvah lesson continued as planned and an upcoming Holocaust memorial service will go on as planned, he said.

The community, which numbers between 500 and 600 people, has received numerous calls of support and Premier Lorne Calvert toured the shul after the incident, Scharfstein added.

CJC executive director Bernie Farber called the graffiti incidents in Toronto and Ottawa "shameful and disgraceful.

"These vandals are targeting building where children or vulnerable adults attend. They skulk around in the middle of the night and they spray paint buildings in an attempt to intimidate our community."

Farber said he expected "non-Jewish community leadership, both political and religious, to speak out and condemn it and nip it in the bud.

"Silence can mean acquiescence," he said.

Farber pointed to an incident earlier in the week in which two protesters demonstrating at the Israeli consulate in downtown Toronto pushed a doctor against a car after he said,

Activists, but not for peace

In the immediate aftermath of the five suicide bombings at the start of the Passover holiday in Israel, the Jewish State "enjoyed" a measure of immunity from world condemnation. After all, it would have been unseemly for the European elites, the Vatican, other Church leaders and "peace activists" to condemn Israel for weeping over its dead.

But when Israel decided to hunt down the murderers who sent the bombers on their grotesque missions, and to destroy the elaborate infrastructure that shelters those murderers and the bombers they have created, that immunity was immediately revoked.

When Israel was no longer seen as the suffering victim, the double standard that has always been applied to the Jewish State was once again waved in its bleeding face.

When Israel proclaimed to the world "We shall not die, but live!" the consciences of the European elites, the Vatican, other Church leaders and the self-styled "peace activists" were rapidly aroused and mobilized on behalf of the mastermind of the latest Palestinian terrorism, the prevaricating leader of the Palestinian Authority. Condemnation of Israel was unequivocal, harsh and swift – and utterly devoid of moral or humane content.

We have seen it and heard it all before, on numerous occasions in the past when Israel refused to submit to its own destruction.

The public outcries and defamations against Israel are unnerving and maddening, but the interventions by the so-called "peace activists" are outright abuses of and affronts to decency.

Hundreds of activists from Italy, France, Britain and other European countries, rushed to Ramallah with the precision and speed of a military operation, all the while remembering to bring along the media, to act as "human shields" for their standard bearer, Yasser Arafat.

These activists belong to the well-travelled, highly-experienced cadre of Europe's anti-globalization protesters.

"What's happening in Palestine is frightening," Bertrand Cassen, chairman of Attac, a French anti-globalization group, told the Wall Street Journal last week. "The emotions are so high we have to intervene. The Sept. 11 effect on the movement is completely gone."

These veterans of Europe's violent anti-globalization demonstrations in Genoa, Barcelona and Gothenburg, "like Jesse Bove, who earned his fame by destroying a McDonald's outlet in southern France," the Journal points out, "have climbed back to prime time on European television newscasts."

According to the Journal, they "offer unflinching support to the Palestinian cause." That should not be surprising, for violent anti-Israelness runs with the course of their hardcore ideological loyalties, their anarchist proclivities and their intolerant, fascist methods – not to mention, of course, the link between the United States and the Jewish State that justifies, in their minds, unceasing, dark disdain for Israel.

Yet, as the Journal article also discloses, deeper and more sinister animosities drive these Europeans' sentiments against the Jewish State.

"For many people in the movement, the crux of the matter is that Israel has no right to exist, but the movement as a whole is only dealing right now, with the aggression launched by [Israel Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon in Palestine (my emphasis)," said Guy Taylor, one of the leaders of Britain's Globalise Resistance group. "We are anti-Zionists, not anti-Semites," he said.

Taylor's distinction, however, is as tortured and fatuous as it is false. The UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, last September pulled down, once and for all, the ugly, duplicitous mask worn by all of the "human rights" and "peace" activists who propound that distinction, who are wilfully oblivious and indifferent to the rights of Israel or of its citizens while they plead only for the rights of the Palestinians, and who hold that the only democracy in the entire Middle East is deserving, not at all, of living in peace after 54 years of constant warfare.

Throughout the large cities of Europe, these "human rights" activists are leading the way in organizing vociferous protests against the Jewish State. And they are happily joined by large Muslim communities whose frenzied hatred of Israel finds a kindred spirit within the raging zealotry of anti-globalization activism.

Adding to the defamation against Israel was B.C. Member of Parliament Svend Robinson. To the everlasting disgrace and shame of the values Canadians hold so dear, and to the Parliament which is the embodiment of those values, he too trekked to Ramallah "to protest against Israel," wearing his kevlar, bullet-proof vest, while the cameras were rolling, of course.

What began in Durban is now resuming. The celebration of hate has hit the streets again and people like Svend Robinson are dancing in the middle.

York University schedules exams on Shabbat

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – This year, Sabbath-observant students at York University had to make special arrangements to write Saturday exams.

This year's examination period, which runs from April 8 to April 25, includes two weekends, which means that some exams will be held on Saturday, April 13 and Saturday, April 20.

Until recently, the University of Toronto, McGill University and York University – which all have significant Jewish faculty and student populations – haven't scheduled exams on Saturday.

Deborah Hobson, York's vice-president of enrolment and student services, said the university broke with established practice to resolve several problems.

The primary challenge, Hobson said, has been to meet the demands of a growing student population while available space has remained fixed.

In addition, the ability to easily purchase term papers on the Internet has led more professors to select examinations as the most effective method to test students' knowledge. This has put tremendous pressure on the administration to set exams, post grades and mail out transcripts before the summer term begins, she said.

Hobson, who is in charge of the registrar's office, which schedules exams, said that over the past 5 years, it has become increasingly difficult for the registrar to make sure the schedule accommodates all the needs of the university.

Muslim and Christian students have had to ask for accommodation to meet their religious constraints, and in scheduling exams on the Jewish Sabbath, it was felt that all religions would be treated fairly, Hobson said.

She acknowledged that no other religion has to deal with the limitations on writing exams that the Jewish Sabbath involves, but she said the availability of alternate exam dates should resolve most of those issues.

Prof. Martin Lockshin, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said many students will hesitate to ask for special treatment.

With the change in policy, students who prefer to remain anonomous, have raised concerns that requests for alternate dates, which involve the writing and monitoring of equivalent exams by professors, could cause hidden resentments and negatively affect grades because teachers would not be remunerated for the additional tasks.

As well, some faculty members resent the fact that the university believes the way to demonstrate tolerance to its various multicultural communities is by not giving religious accommodation to anyone. Others contend the new exam schedule runs against the spirit of the university.

York's Senate policy states that "classes and examinations will not be held on public holidays" or "on the evening prior to, or during the day of… the first and second days of Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur or the first two and last two days of Passover."

Walter Whiteley, spokesperson for the contract and grievance committee of the York University Faculty Association, which represents 1,150 faculty and librarians, said in a statement that, despite not being spelled out, "it almost went without saying that classes and exams wouldn't be held on Saturday or Sunday."

Whitely said working lives and expectations at York are "governed by established practices and collegial processes.

"Few details of these practices – that include no compulsory work on weekends, class size norms… are written down. When we refer to them, we rely on the shared assumption that these practices will continue to be respected."

Whitely said the recent change in exam policy is inexcusable because it was made without consulting YUFA.

The university "sent the required memo… months after the decision was made, weeks after scheduling was in process, a couple of weeks after Senate was 'notified,' and after the new schedule – with the new practices of weekend exams – was issued to students," Whiteley said.

"This is the first time I've seen the university act in such a fashion," said Prof. Harvey Mandel, who has been teaching at York for 31 years.

The change in policy and the way it was implemented will have negative ramifications for many of the students and faculty involved, Mandel said.

He said many of his students have told him they will not be able to write exams on Saturday due to religious and employment constraints.

While this has occurred in the past, Mandel said he has never had to accommodate so many students. He said the change will mean more work for faculty to write equivalent exams for the students involved, as well as being available to invigilate the additional dates.

However, Mandel said the long-term concern is the message being sent to faculty members.

"When the administration begins to implement such significant changes in policy without extensive consultations, faculty members begin to question the significance of their involvement in the daily governance of the university," he said in a statement posted on YUFA's Web site.

Toronto doctor decides not to look away

Goldman assaulted at Palestinian protest

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As demonstrators marched by, Dr. Bernard Goldman couldn't look away any longer.

On March 30th, Goldman, a prominent Toronto heart surgeon, stepped out of a Bloor Street bookstore and found himself in the middle of a Palestinian protest.

"There was palpable hatred in the air. It was so boisterous, you could almost sense the violence and hatred in the crowd," Goldman, 66, said in an interview.

With feelings of disappointment, frustration and horror fresh in his mind from the ongoing news about Israel and the barrage of suicide bombings, Goldman said, as he stepped outside of Chapters on the beautiful day with his daughter-in-law and grandson, he was confronted by the very same scenes he had just seen on CNN.

About 1,000 demonstrators were marching towards the Israeli consulate to commemorate the Palestine Day of Land. The protest took on a violent edge when participants began burning Israeli flags and two journalists were assaulted for attempting to film the incident.

While many bystanders chose to avert their eyes, Goldman, who had been brought up with stories about the pro-Nazi demonstrations that had taken place in Toronto in the 1930s and the community's silence as the Holocaust progressed in Europe, decided to look at the crowd directly.

"I caught the eye of one of the protesters and said 'Stop the suicide bombers.'"

For the statement, Goldman, an award-winning surgeon, was called a murderer and shoved into a parked car by several demonstrators with such force that he suffered a broken shoulder.

Reflecting on the incident, Goldman noted that "in a free and democratic society where people have the right to march, they should also have the obligation not to be violent.

"And bystanders should have the right to free speech without intimidation or fear."

In this community, Goldman said, "there is a general discomfort and embarrassment about being too vocal.

"People are afraid to speak out in support of Israel in fear of appearing to be too Jewish."

However, "this demonstration was just indicative of the Palestinian deceitfulness which is to play the victim while being an aggressor in the most inhumane, immoral way possible," Goldman noted.

"The situation in the Middle East is complicated," Goldman said, "and no one supports the killing of innocent Palestinian civilians."

But the community must support Israel and its judgment at this time because its very existence is at stake, he said.

Goldman, who is one of the founders of the Cardiac Surgical Centre in Toronto at Sunnybrook Hospital, has been involved for many years in the training of heart surgeons at Shaarei Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem.

Dr. Bernard Goldman

When he talks to his Israeli colleagues, Goldman said the extent of the tragedy hits him on a professional level.

Doctors who have been trained to be heart surgeons and used to operate on Israelis and Arabs are now spending their time taking out ball bearings, screws and nails from the most recent victims of suicide bombings, he said.

The audacity to fight back

Like a red hot spark in dry tinder, hostility towards Israel has spread into raging demonstrations throughout the Muslim world, across Europe and even closer to home, here in Canada. The result has been a wildfire of incitement, and ominous, wildly threatening manifestations of brazen anti-Semitism.

In Ottawa last week, a synagogue was vandalized and defaced; in Saskatoon, a synagogue was set to the torch. In cities throughout Europe, but especially in France, which has the largest Muslim community in Europe, Jewish institutions, cemeteries, schools and synagogues were set upon by thugs, arsonists and assorted other craven bullies. The violent protests against the Jewish state have followed upon the violent language against the Jewish state.

In Rome last week, the editorialist in L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican's official news organ, accused Israel of launching a campaign of "extermination" against the Palestinians in the Holy Land. The editorial preceded a statement by the Pope in which he berated Israel for "humiliating" the Palestinians.

The ferocity and venom of the protests has been shocking, and Jews around the world are reeling from that shock.

After the conference on racism in Durban, South Africa, however, we should have been prepared. Durban was proof that the campaign against Israel has been elevated to a sophisticated, quasi-legal, quasi-religious, quasi-national multi-front attack. The violent demonstrations against the Jewish state and against Jews are nothing but the foul, poisonous harvest from the seeds of hate that have swirled in the international wind these past many years.

Protesters shout their calumnies at Israel; they demand "the end of the occupation," even as they call for the audacious Jewish state to be punished. Forgotten by the protesters, though, is that most Israelis also seek the end of the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. But most Israelis also know that Yasser Arafat seeks the end of a different "occupation," namely, the "occupation" of all of pre-1948 Mandatory Palestine. Also forgotten by the protesters is the fact that Israel only mobilized against the terrorists and the terror infrastructure after an unprecedented wave of five Passover suicide bombings.

Israel may indeed be audacious, but its audacity is simply that it wants to live, that it wants to live as a Jewish state in the Muslim Middle East and that it will fight back when enemies set upon it to deny it the right to live.

Next week, on Yom Ha'atzmaut, the fifth day of Iyar, we must gather in our homes, assembly halls, places of worship, schools and public squares to show the world that if it is audacious to want to live, then it is an audacity we all share.

Israel's audacity must be ours as well.

Israelis resilient

While the media seizes on every sensationalistic and negative element of the current conflict's affect on Israeli society, there is some positive news about the resilience of Israel and its brave citizens.

With a curious journalistic glee, many in the media have reported on the "movement" in Israel to refuse to serve in the army in the disputed territories. Yet is this movement an accurate picture of Israel – a weakening society that no longer has the resolve to stand firm in its right to exist as a Jewish State? Hardly.

In recent days, as reservists have been called up to defend Israel from barbaric terror, the army has been faced with a shortage of food for its soldiers. A friend of mine there explained how the Israel Defence Forces simply did not have enough food to feed them. The army assumes that only 70-80 per cent of those called for reserve duty actually report. But after the horrors of the Passover massacre, close to 100 per cent of the call-up turned up to defend the country and its people. The army was caught unprepared for the high response rate.

Luckily, Israelis are fiercely supportive of their soldiers and have brought food to the bases which are now inundated with Passover cakes, matzot and juice for the soldiers. Indeed, as we in the Diaspora cling to our television sets and despair, Israelis simply carry on. As they would tell us with a hint of arrogance and nonchalance, things may not be great, but yehieh tov, they will get better.

Annan is anti-Israel

While I agree with Paul Michaels ("Misconceptions standard in Mideast conflict," CJN, March 21) that we should debunk the concept of "illegal occupation" of the territories, I disagree when he states that UN secretary general Kofi Annan's statement was due to ignorance.

In his statement, Annan expressed an anti-Israel bias that is incompatible with what is supposed to be the impartial position of the UN secretary general. I wish to add that this is not the first time Annan has expressed an anti-Israel bias.

Let us boycott Europe

It was with incredulity that I read of the boycott by the European Union of Israeli goods. I have of course read for some time about the EU's position on Israel and the West Bank terrorists; it appears to welcome the killing of Jews and blames the Jews for the atrocities committed upon them.

The Europe that created the Holocaust did not attempt to justify the killing of six million Jews, but today it attempts to justify its anti-Semitism and the continued killing of Jews on the basis that Jews have brought it upon themselves.

The position taken with regard to Israel is merely a form of blatant anti-Semitism.

In response to this boycott, let us boycott all goods manufactured in the EU. Do not purchase Mercedes, Volkswagens and BMWs. Stop buying French perfumes, French wines, German wines, different countries' agricultural products and so forth. Let us forget travel to Europe and deny them the tourist dollar. Let us all stand up for our brothers and sisters living in a terrorist hell and attempt to punish those who condone it. American products match the quality of European products. Let us patronize the only country that stands behind Israel.

We cannot condone the actions of the European community. Let us teach them morality and ethics through our wallets. I believe that this is the only thing the EU will recognize.

Make politicians accountable

With few exceptions, politicians are motivated by the simple desire to be re-elected. Fine. In the meantime, Jewish community leaders in the Diaspora will conduct a campaign to promote Israel's cause, which will clearly show these politicians that their re-electibility lies in the survival of a secure Israel. At present, one sees no evidence that a concerted effort to this end is under way.

Strength in unity

We are witnessing frightening times for our beloved, beleaguered Israel. Israel's very survival is a stake.

It is not coincidental that a synagogue in Toronto was recently the object of arson, that schoolchildren in France are being attacked with stones, that Muslim extremists in the United Kingdom are calling for death to the Jews, that anti-Semitism is rising and rampant around the world or that the UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa turned into a debacle.

The war against Israel and the Jews will be won not on the battlefield, but through the printed or spoken word. We see it all around us – lies, distortions and a lack of journalistic integrity.

It is dangerous to bury our heads in the sand and hope, pray or pretend the situation will get better or go away. We must be fearless in our response. Our strength comes from a united powerful voice. The Arabs and Palestinians are out in full force and large numbers. We owe it to Israel to do no less.

Return to Kuty

By MURRAY TEITEL

The town begins on top of the hill and tumbles down to the river. Between the wars, the river formed a border flowing between Poland and Romania. That was when she lived in the town – on the Polish side. When her parents were born, the town was in Austria. Today it is in Ukraine.

Until the Holocaust descended upon them, it mattered little to the regional Jews on which side of the Cheremoshk they found themselves. On either, Yiddish was the language in which they conducted business, expressed feelings and held their endless disputations on religion, socialism and Zionism. When he was 11, her brother was sent to the town across the river to study in the yeshiva of the renowned Vishnitzer Rebbe. Once a month, she and her mother would cross the bridge to bring him home for Shabbos, acknowledging the brief change in sovereignty only by purchasing grapes while on the Romanian side, as if the fruit stalls of Vishnitz were the duty free shops of the Carpathian Mountains.

Though she left Kuty in 1935 at age 13, the town is still a part of her.

"You will never know," she told me once, "what it is like to live in a place where the scent of pine and the sound of rushing water fill the air. When I arrived in Canada, Toronto looked ho hum."

In winter the snows were as high as an adult's waist. My grandfather, a robust man, built a sled. Carrying her in one arm and the sled in the other, he would climb a path going to the peak of nearby Mt. Ovidyush and together they would sled back down, repeating the exercise again and again. In summers they would picnic by the river. My grandfather would enter the river upstream and let the fast moving current carry him back to his family.

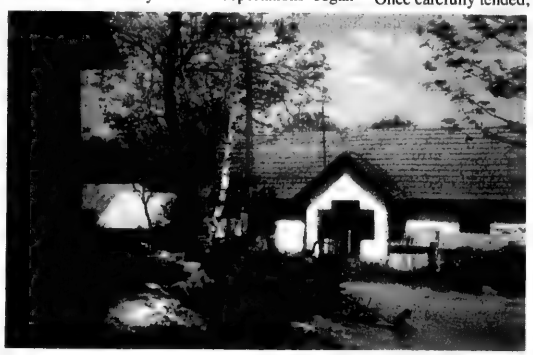
In 1998, after a 63 year absence, she returned to Kuty. I went with her.

In Lviv, the capital of Galicia, the westernmost province of Ukraine, we hired both a driver with a car and a translator. (In Ukraine, the drivers don't speak English and the handful of English speakers don't drive.) In magnificent spring weather, the ubiquitous chestnut trees each blooming with hundreds of vertical clusters of white blossoms that looked like Sabbath candles, we headed out into the fabled, rich, black earth of the Ukrainian Steppe.

The effects of post-Communist corruption and mismanagement were everywhere visible: thin people dressed in rags led farm animals on ropes to graze on roadside weeds; 10 people ploughed with horses for every one on a tractor; factories were abandoned; weeds smothered rusted machinery.

We reached the foothills. The air became cooler as the car began to climb. My mother stopped talking. I suspected her thoughts had turned to the townspeople murdered in the Holocaust. To-day Kuty has a population of about 4,000 people, almost all of them ethnically Ukrainian. The Polish census of 1939 found the following numbers: Ukrainians – 1,550, Poles – 600, Latins – 550, Jews – 2,520, others – 430.

On Sept. 17, 1939, Kuty was occupied by the Red Army, itself displaced on July 1, 1941, by Romanian and Hungarian forces allied with Germany. Word of deportations began to circulate. Some Jews tried to escape to Romania which, though allied with Hitler, did not at that time surrender its Jews. Certain Ukrainian farmers set ambushes and would kill those they caught. Other Jews prepared hiding places.



Street scene in Dehova

On April 10, 1942, Gestapo and SS units, aided by Ukrainian police, set Jewish homes on fire to force inhabitants out of their hiding places, killing about 950. On April 24, 500 and on Sept. 9, another 800 were deported to the concentration camp outside nearby Kolomaya from which they were later transported to death camps.

When we entered the town, of course, she wanted to see her former house, refusing to entertain the notion that it might no longer exist. Her well-off maternal grandparents had built it for her parents to entice them back to Kuty from Kolomaya where they had settled after marrying. It had a second floor balcony. People would come in the summer to sit on it and be cooled by the breeze. Who in their right mind would tear down such a beautiful house?

People are milling around a public building. We stop. Eva, our translator, is out of the car talking to people who look old enough to have been alive before the war. She settles on someone who looks too young. I see him shake his head. He points to his watch. I walk over and tell her to tell him we will have him back in time. Before he can refuse, Eva and I basically kidnap him by "ushering" him into the back of the car. Bernard, our driver, quickly pulls away.

He introduces himself as Michael Niemetz, a collector of local artifacts that he houses in a small museum outside the town. When we explain we are Jewish he becomes very interested.

Can we read Hebrew?

Of course.

Could we tell him what is written on the stones in the Jewish cemetery?

No problem. But first this house. It was on the main street at the corner of the street on which the courthouse stood, Ulitze Sodona. The Polish church was across the road.

We drive on what are undoubtedly the very cobblestones my mother trod as a child. They are buckled as if formed into mini-mountain ranges by tectonic plates below. My mother recognizes the park across from city hall. Once carefully tended, it is now overgrown with weeds among which goats graze. We pass in front of the church but do not see the house. My mother appears agitated: "It's somewhere here. I know it."

Then, after more driving, she says, matter of factly: "That's it. On the right, straight ahead." And there, indeed, is a house with a solid wooden balcony. The facade of the ground floor has been modernized, but the balcony with its four heart shapes carved into each wooden rail is unmistakably original (and, undoubtedly, my great grandfather's symbolic expression of his wish for the young couple's marriage). And there, indeed, across the street is the Polish church – the back of it.

We look at the house and walk down Ulitze Sodona where there is no trace of the court or lawyers' offices. The back of the house looks shabby. Gone are the fruit trees in the backyard orchard of my mother's youth. Though the owner will let us, she decides not to go inside. Having proven her point, she seems focused on fulfilling her end of the bargain with Pan Niemetz, so we head to the Jewish cemetery.

It must be at least a half a square kilometre in area. The 1715 charter by which a noble of the Pitotski family founded the town gave full civic rights to the Jews, who always formed about half the town's population.

Unfenced, it is covered in weeds and thorny bushes. The stones that have fallen are sprinkled with goat droppings. Nonetheless, Eva is full of admiration for the locals who, unlike their counterparts in other towns she has visited, have not removed the headstones to use as building materials.

Pan Niemetz and I wade into this sea of neglect. The gravestones yield little information since the dead are identified not by surnames but by their and their fathers' Hebrew given names. My maternal great-grandparents are somewhere here, but only because they had the good fortune to die before the Holocaust. How far back in this desolate tract might the people from whom I came be traced? Is Rav Avraham Gershon Kitover, the brother in law of the Ba'al Shem Tov, founder of Chassidism, buried here in the town of his birth?

We invite Pan Niemetz to dinner, but he has a prior engagement. We navigate the undulating cobblestones and find a restaurant. My mother and I order salads. She has become agitated: "Thank God we found that house. I don't know what I'd have done if it hadn't been there."

"What's the big deal?" I ask "It's only a house."

Her reply borders on the vehement. How could I understand? I can go back to Euclid Avenue any time I want and see where I grew up. She can't.

This is true. But have I? Do I want to? This woman who has both a master's degree and a master's in education is behaving irrationally. I don't argue with her.

We cross the Cheremoshk for an uneventful spin around Vishnitz (since the end of World War II also in Ukraine) and spend the night at the Roxalana Hotel in Ivano-Frankivsk. The next morning, we head out to look for traces of my late father's family in the three small farming villages near Rohatyn where they had lived: Dycky, Pitkamin and Dehova.

But for the introduction of electricity, Dycky looks exactly like it must have when my father left in 1933: dirt roads along which small, unrenovated houses, each with a small yard stand, the whole surrounded by vast fields. There and in Pitkamin, obliging people take us down narrow lanes, past barking dogs, through gaggles of geese to visit women in their 70s and 80s, but none have heard of the Teitels or Froshes (my grandmother's prominent family that managed large estates on behalf of absentee landlords and sent sons to university in Lvov, as Lviv was known at the time). There are no Jewish cemeteries.

Our last stop is Dehova, my father's birthplace. We stop someone and soon a number of women congregate around us. The consensus is that if anyone would know, it would be an old woman who lives at the end of the lane we are on. Eva and I proceed on foot while my mother and Bernard stay in the car. We open a rusted metal gate and enter a yard with a well and geese. A woman sits in her doorway, bathed in sunlight. Behind her, the cottage interior is very dark. She has lived in Dehova since before the war but doesn't recognize our surname. She remembers a different Jewish family but not what happened to it. We talk for a few minutes. Eva and I return to the car.

"So?" my mother asks.

"Nothing," I reply. "Nobody remembers us. No one's heard of us."

For an instant she considers this and says: "Now do you understand why finding our house meant so much to me yesterday? If not for that house it would have been as if we had never lived here."

Murray Teitel is the son of Miriam Teitel who lived in Kuty from 1922 to 1935. April 10 marks the 60th anniversary of the initial deportation of the Jews of Kuty.

Scholarly arrogance

The media have recently played up the claims of certain archeologists that the entire story of the Exodus is an invention and that it never took place. As proof, they cite the fact that no artifacts have turned up in Egyptian archives or other sources that mention the enslavement and the departure of the Jews, as we have been taught by the Torah.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Now archeologists are generally a very responsible group. They flesh out history based on their findings, and they have greatly enriched our understanding of antiquity. Not surprisingly, archeology is a favourite scientific pursuit in Israel, and I myself read the results of the scholars' investigations with great interest.

But lately some of them have, in my opinion, gone too far. Since no evidence has been found in Egypt or elsewhere that would verify the presence of our forbears in that land, they have come to the conclusion that the whole tale is based on folk memory, and therefore the Exodus from Egypt never took place.

I reject this conclusion, because in addition to all other considerations, it is based on dubious reasoning.

For the negation of our people's presence, enslavement and liberation from Egypt is based not on contrary data that come to us from Egyptian sources, but rather from the absence of data that would confirm that our people spent hundreds of years in that land.

To put it simply, these so-called "minimalist" scholars come to their conclusions because no one has found evidence that the alleged history took place. I find that reasoning appalling. To say that something did not happen because I or someone else has been unable to find evidence that it did is a conclusion based on zero evidence.

I advise the scholars to look some more and if they look in the right places with more energy and diligence, maybe they will find something. But merely to say that since so far they have not found anything, the Exodus could not have taken place is, to me, logically unacceptable.

To be sure, the number of minimalists is pretty small, but of course truth is not based on counting heads. The furor that the Etz Hayim, the new Conservative Torah and commentary, has created does not stem from the authors' assertion that the Israelite Exodus never took place, but from their discussing this theory at all. I think that, taken in context, the material is worth knowing, and readers do not need to be shielded from possible conclusions. They are not forced to accept them, and the Torah will continue to speak for us.

Solidarity forever

In a year when we have been plagued with the unexpected and unthinkable, we should all be reminded once more how important it is for us to show our support for Israel.

During a time like this, when we dread instant news updates and cringe when we even hear the words "Middle East," it seems almost impossible to find any light in such an unsettling situation. I wanted to write an upbeat Yom Ha'atzmaut column, but finding a theme seemed almost impossible.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I was saddened this week when I found out that by the famous law of six degrees of separation, I had a connection to a woman my age who was tragically killed in Israel. As well, I was disturbed to hear, but understood why, some friends of our family decided to leave their beloved home in Israel, after much deliberation and debate.

As a Jewish student at a university where we have been inundated with so much anti-Israel rhetoric, I have felt particularly sensitive. It seems that only a small percentage of our student population is excited to see Israel get another year older. Dalhousie students, like many others across Canada, have intensely strong opinions on the current crisis, yet only one perspective – an anti-Israel one – seems to have been portrayed, both on campus, and more obviously, in the student newspaper. An even bigger problem is that the journalism is biased, ignorant and based on opinion, although written in a "current events"-type section.

There has been outrage from the Jewish community; we write letters to the editor and we organize support rallies, yet we have not seen our efforts lead to a positive change.

We must allow Yom Ha'atzmaut to be meaningful to us. Israel is another year older, after a difficult year where many did all in their power to seek changes for the better. We still see vigour in a nation that has so much reason to feel despondent.

It is fascinating to examine the differences between a Canadian and an Israeli. I am constantly in awe of Israeli citizens my age who have a vision that is larger than themselves, one that sees Israel and its independence as larger than their own single life. It just never even occurred to me that I could do such a thing.

I suppose it is my sheltered Canadian conscience speaking here, one that is lucky to have never had to make such choices or live such a life. As Canadians, we do not apply the Israeli framework to our daily lives; however, such a framework could bring about a much-needed reform for Jewish Canadians. It really comes down to putting away individualism and embracing collective responsibility.

The truth is, if we cannot go and defend Israel, there is so much more that still needs to be done, even here, from Canada. There is money to be raised to support Israel, there are letters that need to be written to the Canadian government to remind them that we as Canadian Jews, and more importantly, as supporters of a State of Israel, insist that Ottawa continue its support of the most legitimate democracy in the Middle East. The list goes on and on, but we must remember that all contributions count in one way or another and there is no better time than now to make them.

Yom Ha'atzmaut has changed for me this year. When I was in Jewish day school, we would dress in blue and white, sing and dance and eat falafel on that day. This year, I will go to bed on erev Yom Ha'atzmaut, hoping that when I watch the news the next day, we will have a day without the colour red, as difficult as that has become.

This is the time to channel our efforts together. Our message as Jewish Canadians must be powerful and strong. We have to put aside our ideological and political differences and show the solidarity that Israel desperately needs. I have promised myself to stop debating the variety of possible solutions with those who are equally frustrated. Instead, I will focus my energy on bringing about something that will actually benefit Israel.

Let us all hope that next year at this time, we can sing and dance again, without such heavy hearts.

Am Yisrael Chai.

Biased article sparks student activism

Since the current intifadah began 18 months ago, Jewish communities have been trying to find ways to increase student activism and get students to speak out in support of Israel. For many of Winnipeg's Jewish students, such activism was sparked by the publication of an article in a recent issue of the University of Manitoba's student newspaper called "And the Award for Terrorism goes to... Israel."

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

In order for students to become active they first need to become motivated, and nothing motivates them more than slanderous, inaccurate statements printed in student newspapers.

The article, which was written for the Manitoban by a respected student who ran for president of the U of M last year, contained comments associating Israel with ethnic cleansing. It caused an uproar among Jewish students and sent a flurry of them running to their computers to write letters to the editor.

The pandemonium that took place was something that I have never seen in all the years I have been involved in the Jewish community. I received phone call after phone call from people expressing outrage at the article. Several responses were written to the Manitoban, clarifying the article's fallacies and presenting the other side of the Middle East conflict. Although I think people were calling and commenting to me because I am the editor of the other Winnipeg student newspaper, the atmosphere of activism was real and deserved.

This activism came just a week after the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative, a youth-led group that promotes Israel awareness, brought Neil Lazarus to Winnipeg.

Lazarus, an internationally acclaimed Mideast expert and creator of the company awesomeseminars.com, spoke about the media's bias toward the Palestinians and what we need to be aware of when reading or watching the news. He came with Michael Schneider, who spoke about raising awareness about Israel, the situation in the Middle East and how students can take an active role in supporting Israel, including writing letters.

With the comments made by Lazarus and Schneider still fresh in students' minds and an opportunity to speak out in the pages of a student newspaper, it is not a surprise that people finally found a way to get their voices heard.

While letters to the editor and opinion pieces in the Manitoban can be read by the entire city of Winnipeg, it was refreshing to see how some members of the Jewish community made sure that the rest of the community knew about what was happening at the university.

Jay Greenfeld, Winnipeg's Jewish Student Association director sent out a copy of the inflammatory article not only to students, but also to prominent leaders such as Izzy Asper and Bob Freedman, the Jewish federation director. Teachers brought the article to the Jewish day schools and talked to their students about the issue.

Throughout the intifadah, the Jewish community has brought in speakers and held rallies, but getting students involved in activism has always been a challenge. So why are students speaking up now?

This has been the first time they have been directly affected by the bias in reporting and by anti-Israel sentiments. Finally students have a cause they can relate to. A member of their own student community has given the Jewish students the fuel and desire to get involved and become active, and hopefully this will carry on into more activism from students in the community at large.

Now, after saying all this, I want to point out that this saga has a twist, a curveball that people need to be aware of. This Manitoban article also happened to be plagiarized. It was taken off a Web site called allaboutpalestine.com. When the community found this out, of course, they became even more infuriated. How could a newspaper print an article so one-sided, and a plagiarized one at that? This once again brings issues of reliability and accuracy of the media into question.

What can be learned from all this? Read critically, shed that apathetic student skin and become active.

The Kirshner File

Britain's moment in Palestine was momentous

Conventional wisdom holds that Britain betrayed the Zionist movement after assuming the League of Nations mandate in Palestine in 1922. Proponents of this view cite a litany of factors: Britain's 1939 White Paper, which envisaged a binational rather than a Jewish state in Palestine; Britain's arrest of Zionist leaders after World War II, and Britain's abstention on the November 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Tom Segev, an Israeli historian, begs to differ with this interpretation. And in One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs Under the British Mandate (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), he makes a compelling case for this thesis. "The British kept their promise to the Zionists," he writes in this richly documented, scrupulously nuanced book.

For example: Britain opened Palestine to mass Jewish immigration, though later it restricted the flow of Jews into the country. Britain also permitted Jews to purchase Arab land (even if this right was subsequently amended) and to establish settlements and develop agriculture and industry.

"Contrary to the widely held belief of Britain's pro-Arabism, British actions considerably favoured the Zionist enterprise," he states in this massive volume, which draws on a wealth of archival materials from, among other sources, the Israel State Archive, the Central Zionist Archive and the Public Record Office in London.

Segev compares Britain's role to a circus performer trying to ride two horses simultaneously. Caught between the conflicting ambitions of Zionists and Palestinian nationalists, the British often disappointed both sides.

In an attempt to come to grips with the turmoil in Palestine, Britain appointed a succession of commissions to study its complexities. As Henry Gurney, the mandate's last chief secretary, wrote: "If all the books of statistics prepared for the 19 commissions that have had a shot at the problem were placed on top of one another they would reach as high as the King David Hotel."

Indeed, no single report ever issued by Britain resolved the conundrum. In the end, fed up with the mess, Britain relinquished the mandate, paving the way for a Jewish declaration of independence, an Arab invasion and a full-fledged war.

The colonial scramble for territory, natural resources and markets propelled Britain into the morass of Middle Eastern politics.

Shortly after the outbreak of World War I, Britain, as well as France and Russia, began to eye the tantalizing Ottoman dominions in the Fertile Crescent, which extended from the Nile to the Tigris rivers.

Segev claims that Britain was not guided by strategic considerations. In fact, the reverse is true. As he himself concedes, the British issued the 1917 Balfour Declaration, with its pledge of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, to bolster their foothold in the region and to win international Jewish support for its war effort.

Having ousted the Ottoman Turks – Germany's ally – from Palestine, Britain was left with the burden of bringing a measure of order and, hopefully, prosperity to Palestine, a backwater by any yardstick.

When Gen. Edmund Allenby marched into Jerusalem in 1917, the city was awash with hunger and rife with disease. "The heart aches when one looks at it all," observed Chaim Weizmann, a Zionist luminary.

For the first few years, until the mandate came into force, the British military ran the show. And by all accounts, the army was successful in stamping out epidemics, improving the water supply and reopening schools, banks and courts.

Even as Britain consolidated its grip, Palestinian leaders made it abundantly clear that they were on a collision course with Zionism. They demanded independence and voiced opposition to Jewish immigration and Jewish land purchases. Najib Azuri, an Arab intellectual, prophesied that the two movements were destined to wage war until one defeated the other. David Ben-Gurion, who would be Israel's first prime minister, agreed.

At the 1919 peace conference in Versailles, France, the Zionists submitted what Segev describes as "a dream map." It included southern Lebanon, the Golan Heights and territory east of the Jordan River. The area allotted to Britain by the League of Nations to administer was, in fact, half the size. The Zionists, nevertheless, were pleased.

The same could not be said of the Arabs.

Two years before the official establishment of the mandate, "the opening shot" in the war over the fate of Palestine was fired. In April 1920, at the Nebi Musa procession in Jerusalem, rioting broke out, claiming the lives of four Jews and five Arabs.

This was followed, a year later, by melees in Jaffa during which 47 Jews and 48 Arabs were killed. As the years passed, violence became a bitter leitmotif of the mandate.

The fighting gave Britain some pause. Comparing Palestine with Ireland, Field Marshal Henry Wilson, the highest-ranking British officer in the Middle East, declared that Britain had no business being in Palestine – "Jewland," he dubbed it – and should leave. Wilson's advice was ignored, perhaps because others maintained that Britain's departure would ultimately endanger its grip on Egypt.

The first British high commissioner in Palestine, Herbert Samuel, was the scion of a rich Jewish family from Liverpool. Samuel, whom Segev claims resembled an operatic character, was a committed Zionist. Yet he came to regard the Arabs, who outnumbered the Jews by a wide margin, as a minority in need of protection, and urged the Zionist movement to exercise restraint and refrain from gestures liable to anger Palestinians.

David Ben-Gurion, a year after the end of the British mandate.

The Arab community, however, considered him an enemy. In Segev's estimation, Samuel led Palestine toward its first steps into the 20th century.

Next to the mandate itself, Segev notes, the most important Zionist achievement during this period was its success in splitting Tel Aviv from Jaffa, a nearly all-Arab town. It formalized the principle of separation between Jews and Arabs (a debate which, incidentally, still rages in Israel). The "principle of segregation," as he describes it, was accepted by virtually all segments of the Zionist elite.

In discussing the issue of Jewish immigration, Segev points out that, even at the height of aliyah in the 1920s and 1930s, relatively few Jews settled in rough-and-tumble Palestine. In any event, he adds, the Zionists were not keen about uncontrolled and unplanned immigration. Like the British, they believed in the link between immigration and the country's capacity to absorb new olim. In those years, the most desirable candidates for aliyah were young, unmarried men who could work the soil.

Insofar as land purchases are concerned, Segev says that more Arab land was generally available than Zionists could afford to buy. Among the sellers, ironically, were leaders of the Arab nationalist movement – "patriots on the outside, traitors on the inside."

Segev, rightly so, devotes a considerable amount of space to the 1936-39 Arab revolt, the first mass uprising in Palestine. This intifadah, which was directed as much against the Yishuv as Britain, gave rise to suggestions for partitioning the country. The Arabs opposed the idea. The Zionists favoured it.

Britain suppressed the Arab revolt in league with the Jewish Agency and the Haganah. But as World War II approached, the British government tried to win the friendship of the Palestinians through appeasement. "If we must offend one side," Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain said, "let us offend the Jews rather than the Arabs."

Which is precisely what happened. In May 1939, after the St. James conference in London, Britain announced a new policy designed to mollify the Arabs. Within a decade, an independent, binational state would be created. In addition, Jewish immigration and land purchases would be curtailed.

Chamberlain's charismatic successor, Winston Churchill – a Zionist – allowed the White Paper to die. Meanwhile, Haj Amin al-Husseini, the exiled grand mufti of Jerusalem, cozied up to the Nazis.

Palestine, which had been gripped by a recession, flourished during the war. But in 1944, Lechi, a Revisionist Zionist paramilitary organization, launched an anti-British guerrilla campaign, which came to a head in the immediate postwar years.

Having grown weary – and wary – of its responsibilities, Britain turned the mandate over to the United Nations, leaving behind a record of concrete achievements: new roads, railways, ports, schools and hospitals, a judiciary free of corruption and an electric power grid.

Britain, though, had no success in reconciling Jewish and Arab interests. Jews and Arabs would address these pivotal issues on the battlefield and through diplomacy in subsequent years.

Ethiopian immigrant realizes dreams in Canada

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joseph Kibur learned at a young age to expect the unexpected.

At age 11 he came to Canada with nothing but raw talent. By the time he became a citizen, one organization had helped this Ethiopian Jew become the champion he had only dreamed of being.

"I came to Canada in 1983 with my family and started cross country running," says Kibur, 29, as he sits arm in arm with his wife, Mahlet Zena.

The couple, who live in Vancouver, were on a recent visit to Toronto.

"Harry Hus, who was involved in coaching athletics with Maccabi saw me compete in a race and approached me. He told me about Maccabi youth, and suggested I get more involved. He sponsored me and got me athletic footware," Kibur explains.

Though rumour has it that the Maccabi coach found Kibur running the race barefoot, Kibur sets the record straight, saying that he was wearing shoes, but didn't have enough money to buy a good quality pair.

Money wasn't Kibur's only difficulty upon arriving in Montreal from Ethiopia.

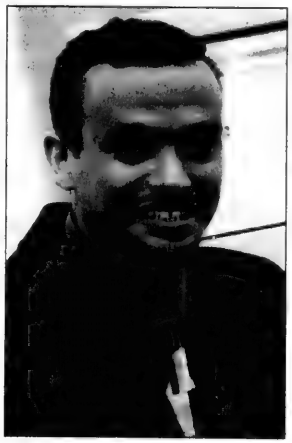
"It was hard coming to Canada. There were the language and cultural barriers and I didn't know what was available to me," he says earnestly.

Maccabi stepped in and provided Kibur with more than just shoes.

"My athletic career didn't blossom until I got involved with Maccabi. As a Jewish athlete, Maccabi was a support mechanism. It provided me with direction and motivation. It gave me the opportunity to network, make friends and to go to Israel, where I learned more about the Jewish culture and religion. I knew there were people interested in seeing me succeed."

In fact, Kibur succeeded in becoming a world-class athlete.

At the 1987 Pan American Maccabi Games in Venezuala, Kibur won two gold medals in the 1,200 and 2,000 metre races. In 1990 he competed in the Open Junior Pan American Games, and won a gold in the 5,000 metres. In the 1993 Games in Israel, he became the first athlete to win gold medals in three events – the 1,500, 5,000 and 10,000 metres – in one year. That same year, he won the Canadian Cross Country championships in Vancouver.



Joseph Kibur

That year also marked the last time Kibur would compete for Maccabi.

He was offered a track and field scholarship at Simon Fraser University in British Columbia and headed west. He studied management and systems science, an exciting name for computers, math and business, a discipline Kibur says prepared him very well for his career as an entrepreneur. Kibur now owns a successful Web hosting company called Netnation.com, which is based in Vancouver and trades on the Nasdaq.

Just as Maccabi changed his life, Kibur is now looking to help others in the same way.

"A few months ago I got a call from Tommy [Bacher, senior vice president of Maccabi Canada]. I was thankful because Tommy was supportive of me in the early days and I thought this would be a great opportunity to do what was done for me."

Kibur now sits on the national executive committee as the western representative, and he also made a very generous donation to Maccabi.

"I'm awed by the attitude and commitment Joseph has shown to Maccabi," says Dr. Lawrence Hart, president of Maccabi Canada.

"He sets an incredible example for other alumni," he continues.

"There is so much expertise out there. We're looking for alumni to get involved and coach, fund-raise and run regional programs."

The return to the organization of people who know what it means to walk into the stadium in Israel and have tears well up in their eyes, is essential, especially at this critical time, he says.

"Maccabi gives Jewish athletes the opportunity to participate with their peers on an ongoing basis and to get involved with the Jewish community," says Bacher, who competed in the 1985 games and helped buy Kibur his first pair of track shoes.

"It gives the next generation a chance to develop a bond with Israel. Maccabi also gives athletes the opportunity to be the best they can be," he says.

Now that he's involved with Maccabi again, Kibur hopes others will follow his lead.

"I think all alumni are obligated to pay their dues," says Kibur.

"I would like to see other athletes fulfill their dream. If I can help just one other athlete do that, it's well worth my time."

To get involved with Maccabi Canada call 514-736-6776 or e-mail maccabi@maccabicanada.com.

Young musical duo run their own concert

TORONTO — A brother and sister musical team are running their own classical concert on April 27 at the Armour Heights Presbyterian Church.

William and Andrea Herzog, who play the violin and cello respectively, have decided to take their careers into their own hands. Though they have performed around town many times before, this spring they are going to run the show themselves.

William, 14, and Andrea, 15, began their string studies at age four and five respectively. The duo, who have performed at numerous public events and venues, both as amateurs and professionals, have been called "very promising young Canadians" by Mayumi Seiler, international violinist and artistic director of the Via Saltzburg concert series.

Andrea and William Herzog

Four years ago, they were the two youngest members to be accepted into the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra, and have more recently been invited to play with the Toronto Symphony itself.

The list of the teachers that have trained them looks like a who's who of the Toronto music community and includes Shauna Rolston, Mayumi Seiler, David Hetherington, Anna Lee Patapatanakoon, Daniel Domb, Erika Raum, Bryan Epperson, Lorand Fenyves, Mark Fewer and David Zafer.

Up until a year ago, they were entering competitions to get performing experience, and collecting a multitude of awards. This past year, their fourth at both the Kiwanis and Peel Festivals, Andrea and William entered as soloists and as a chamber duo, and came home with 13 first prizes out of 13 classes between the two of them.

But they saw the limitations of competition and wanted to move beyond it to give an affordable, high quality performance directly to a wider audience, their father, Bruce Herzog, says.

"It's not that they don't enjoy competition," he says. "The problem with competition is it's usually a very limited audience... You often do your best work for only a handful of people."

With their own concerts, they can choose their own repetoire, he says.

So William and Andrea rented a hall, made their own brochures and posters and printed their own tickets. Now they're pounding the pavement, enlisting the support of local businesses, friends and neighbours to sponsor the event and help them sell tickets.

Though their experience as soloists, chamber and orchestral players is extensive, they say their string duo is a very special part of their lives.

"We really enjoy it – we tend not to look at our music when we're playing because we spend most of our time communicating with each other," Andrea says.

"There are no worries when we play together, just music," William says.

If successful, they hope this event will lead to the creation of a series of affordable concerts by talented young musicians within the community.

The Herzog Duo concert starts at 7 p.m. on Saturday, April 27 at the Armour Heights Presbyterian Church at 105 Wilson Ave. near Yonge. Before April 12, tickets are $11 for adults, $7 for students and seniors. At the door, they are $12 and $8.

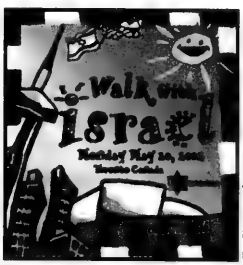
Walk TALK



Israel, We're With You

With Israel at war against terrorism, our visible support is crucial...in huge numbers. We have to tell Israel "we're with you" as loudly as we can.

On Victoria Day, Monday, May 20, the UJA Federation Walk With Israel, starting and ending at the SkyDome, provides the ideal opportunity. While the people of Israel are nervous about walking the streets and conducting normal activities, we are free to take to the streets on their behalf. By participating, you will be sending a critical message of solidarity to the people of Israel when they need it the most.

The joint will be jumping as this year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel kicks off its exciting new 2002 route from the SkyDome at 10:30 sharp (rain or shine).

There's something for everybody – guaranteed. We've got "all the bases covered" at this year's event!

Immediately after the Walk, be sure to take in the sights, sounds and smells of the Walk Festival – inside the SkyDome – where adults and children of all ages – will be treated to great kosher food and fun!

Participants in this year's Walk and the FunRun have a chance to bag some incredible prizes, including two tickets to Israel courtesy of El Al; a Sanyo CD Walkman; a ROOTS Gift Certificate, plus special prizes and a plaque for becoming a CHAI WALKER (raise a minimum of $1800).

Pre-register by May 7th for your free Walk With Israel T-shirt with a minimum sponsorship of $36.00. Day school students should hand in completed Collection Envelopes to their school drop box by Friday, May 3rd to qualify for T-shirt exchanges.

CJC trying to meet with French diplomats

"Stop the suicide bombers."

The doctor's shoulder was broken in the incident (see related story in this issue).

Contacted at Palestine House, Rashad Saleh, who organized the demonstration, said although "I didn't see anything... in a situation where emotions are running high, things like that could happen. I'm sorry if he was hurt, but I had nothing to do with it."

Saleh said the demonstration attracted people from a variety of groups and "the marshals can't be every place."

He condemned last week's graffiti incidents and he distanced the Arab community from the events. "I'm sure the Jewish community has so many enemies, especially racist people in the city, who take an opportunity like that when relations are stressed between the communities," he said.

In a news release late last week, Ontario Premier Mike Harris said he was saddened by the vandalism.

"I condemn these acts of hatred in the strongest possible terms. I will not allow our communities to be intimidated by people who don't understand the freedoms they enjoy. My thoughts are with Ontario's Jewish communities that have been affected by this vandalism."

Meanwhile, CJC is trying to arrange meeting with French diplomats to voice concerns about the recent spate of anti-Semitic violence in France.

The proposed meetings with envoys in Ottawa and at several consulates across the country are part of an effort by Jewish communities around the world to press the government of France to move aggressively to counter the attacks that have targeted Jews, said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Congress. More than 350 incidents have been directed at the Jewish community since the onset of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000.

Five French synagogues were firebombed last week alone. Jews and Jewish institutions in France, Belgium and Germany have been the targets of a rising number of hate crimes.

The Jewish community has faced these attacks for a 1½ years. "What we want to communicate to the envoys is our community's concern over the situation and that public leaders denounce the anti-Semitism and take all necessary steps to curb it," Prutschi said.

The government of France must also employ the anti-hate legislation it has on the books against those who take part in racist attacks, he added.

Until now, the French government "has tended to downplay the situation," Prutschi said. "A lot of incidents have arisen where Jews and Arabs live cheek by jowl in neighbourhoods and schools in different cities. A lot of the activities seems to be the work of younger people. The government has not taken it seriously. It has looked at it as apart of a larger crime problem in cities."

In Toronto meanwhile, Alain Dubuy, deputy consul general and press attache at the Consulate General of France, said the consul is ready to meet with representatives of the Jewish community. The government of France is as "sorry as the Jewish community" about the violence and has made every effort to counter it, he said.

"The French government is very, very concerned about it and they are doing all they can to stop it. It is putting all forces at its disposal to catch the [perpetrators]."

Nevertheless, "these are difficult to stop completely," he added.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles said most of the attacks in France "are linked to the same hate and invective that inspire 9/11 and the Middle East suicide bombers. The time is long overdue for France to deal with the source of that hate – which includes extremist Muslim clerics – before there are further terrorist escalations and bloodshed."

Terror – 'a self-defeating tactic'

The Lessons of Terror*, by Caleb Carr, Random House, $29.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

The basic thesis of this slim volume by novelist and military historian Caleb Carr is simple and unequivocal: the tactic of terror doesn't work. In ways that are unforeseen and unpredictable, terror always boomerangs, punishing the aggressor.

The author writes: "Warfare against civilians, whether inspired by hatred, revenge, greed, or political and psychological insecurity, has been one of the most ultimately self-defeating tactics in all of military history – indeed, it would be difficult to think of one more inimical to its various practitioners' causes."

What modern terrorists share with those who practised similar actions against civilians in earlier times is an abiding inability to see that the strategy is almost always unsuccessful. The author offers a variety of examples to bolster his argument.

For instance, the Roman massacres of German tribes under Augustus led, centuries later, to deadly retaliatory raids that destroyed the empire.

During the American Civil War, General William Sherman's fabled March To the Sea devastated the southern landscape – destroying homes, bridges, railways, roads etc. The long-term result was endless resentment and smouldering hatred among the defeated people of the south. The author asserts that "inflicting starvation, murder and destruction... proved as self-defeating in America as they had anywhere else in the world."

In his wholesale condemnation of terror, Carr includes the firebombing of Dresden during World War II, and the use of atomic weapons against the Japanese, Napalm in Vietnam and air strikes in Kosovo.

There appear to be two flaws in the author's argument. In the first place, he fails to make a necessary distinction between acts of brutality carried out by a national army as part of a formally declared war, and violence against civilians by non-state groups with the aim, not of military victory, but of causing panic and inflicting revenge.

In the second place, it is simply untrue that terror is never effective. One thinks of Napoleon's defeat in Spain, the French experience in Algeria and the American withdrawal from Vietnam. Even when terrorist groups do not achieve all of their aims, they are able to claim victory for some of them.

Carr remains unimpressed at the American response, thus far, to terrorism. "Despite our current military efforts, the core terrorist threats – biological, chemical and even nuclear warfare, suicide bombings and attacks, and still more airplane hijackings, along with the complex programs of state sponsorship necessary to prepare for such actions – remain largely unaddressed at their international roots, whatever our successes against specific groups or individuals."

Turning to the recent intifadah, Carr is sure that Arafat will never be able to achieve the concessions that were available to him before young, would-be "martyrs" began strapping explosives to their bodies and killing innocent civilians.

"Arafat seems destined to see his long campaign of terror go for naught, and the abandonment of his more limited guerrilla warfare a mistake." For the author, the impatient, vain and destructive instinct that encourages terror against the innocent must lead to the downfall of the perpetrators.

He is convinced that terrorism must be met by pre-emptive military action. "It is incumbent upon us to devise a style of war more imaginative, more decisive and yet more humane than anything terrorists can contrive."

Replete with interesting historical information, closely reasoned and passionately argued, The Lessons of Terror, which discusses some of the axial issues of our time, should be carefully considered and widely debated.

How valid is oral tradition?

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Arthur Kurzweil, the pioneering American Jewish genealogist, tells a remarkable story about how a passing remark from his mother's cousin, Maurice, led him to a significant family discovery.

Maurice recalled being told that he was "an 'ainicle' of the Stropkover Rebbe."

Learning that the term "ainicle" usually means grandson but could actually mean any form of descendant, Kurzweil wrote that "my genealogical ears perked up and I knew that I had hit upon a major find."

Kurzweil rushed to the YIVO Institute to begin his investigations into this prominent Chassidic family. But even before he found the vital link between the Stropkover Rebbe and his great-grandfather, he had already began broadcasting it as proven fact.

"What I found myself doing from that point on," he wrote in his book, From Generation to Generation, "was breaking just about every genealogical rule in the book, especially the following two: Never make claims that you aren't sure of, and, Do research from the known to the unknown."

As he explained, it was such an exciting possibility to be descended from this illustrious rabbi that he "couldn't help" telling everybody that it was so, even though the claim at the time was based entirely on "circumstantial evidence."

Although Kurzweil eventually authenticated the link with archival records, he raises important questions about the validity of oral traditions and handed-down stories as genealogical evidence.

Israeli genealogist Chaim Freedman gained considerable expertise on that question while compiling a study of the descendants of the legendary Vilna Gaon, published as Eliyahu's Branches in 1997. He discusses the relevance of oral tradition and related issues in a recent guidebook called Beit Rabbanan: Sources of Rabbinical Genealogy.

Finding many families that claimed a relationship to the Vilna Gaon based on oral traditions, Freedman put them into three categories.

First were the claims that could be easily corroborated by reliable sources and records; these proved the least problematic. Second were the claims that stood up to critical scrutiny and could ultimately be judged as being "highly likely to be valid, beyond any reasonable doubt."

Third were the claims for which insufficient evidence could be found to validate them beyond any reasonable doubt. Freedman found that some cases in this group seemed promising enough to warrant the collection of all available genealogical information should an authenticating link surface one day.

Some oral traditions are patently false, he notes: in one case, research demonstrated that a person who was supposedly an only child actually had 20 siblings! Still, he insists that a "legendary kernel of truth" underlies every oral tradition, and that it's up to the genealogist to find it.

Freedman's methodology is certainly interesting, but whether it violates generally accepted genealogical standards of proof is another question. Genealogists sometimes make "quantum leaps" of faith and probability when charting a few crucial generations in the family trees of Rashi, King David and other revered figures. Such liberties are not universally regarded as kosher.

Summer Conference: Exciting details about the upcoming 22nd International Conference on Jewish Genealogy were recently released. The gathering is scheduled for Aug. 4 thru Aug. 9 at Toronto's Sheraton Centre, and all Canadian Jewish genealogists should plan to attend.

Speakers include Alexander Beider, the renowned expert on Jewish names; Olga Muzychuk, director of the Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine; Oleg Perzashkevich, a Belarus historian; Yale Reisner, director of The Ronald S. Lauder Foundation Genealogy Project in Warsaw; Batya Untershatz, former director of Search Bureau for Missing Relatives in Jerusalem; and Shi Lei, currently a Bar Ilan university student who is a descendant of Kaifeng Chinese Jews.

Yom Hazikaron on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

At 8 p.m. on the 4th of Iyar (April 15), Israel will come to a standstill.

On that evening, sirens will blare and Israelis – and Jews around the world – will pause to remember the thousands of soldiers who paid the ultimate sacrifice for their country. Today, a look at Yom Hazikaron, Israel's Remembrance Day.

Over 20,000 soldiers have fallen since Israel's War of Independence. The Orthodox Union site traces the number of casualties from pre-state battles through the next 50 years [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yomhazikaron/names.html]. Israel's Ministry of Defence maintains a large Hebrew-only Web site dedicated to Yom Hazikaron. You can view a list of all soldiers whose yahrzeit is being observed today [http://www.izkor.gov.il/izkor50.asp]. On the Yizkor page, you can read the special prayer for the fallen soldiers while hearing it recited [http://www.izkor.gov.il/izkor11b.htm]. A Hebrew poetry page includes works of some of the country's premier poets including Natan Alterman, Naomi Shemer and Chana Senesh. It includes King David's lament from the Book of Samuel II upon hearing of the deaths of Jonathan and Saul, "How the mighty have fallen" [http://www.izkor.gov.il/izkor30a.htm].

The sirens will wail in Israel on Yom Hazikaron. But how can the grief and importance of that day be conveyed to Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora? The Virtual Jerusalem Web site recommends the lighting of memorial candles, "giving tzedakah, or charity, or learning on behalf of the deceased. Some learn Torah in the memory of a particular soldier, study history (either of the Jewish state or of Jewish history in general), or spend some time reflecting upon how the sacrifices of Israel's soldiers affect them and the direction their own lives are taking." [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/memorial/]

The Department for Jewish Zionist Education has suggestions for schools and other organizations that would like to hold remembrance ceremonies, including readings in English and the Prayer for the Welfare of soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/zkatz/zk/]. United Synagogue Youth's Karen Stein has prepared some more suggestions [http://www.uscj.org/usy/pb/kzikaron.htm].

Aside from the over 20,000 fallen soldiers, many more have sustained serious injuries while serving in the military. The Zahal Disabled Veterans Organization (ZDVO) was established in 1949 to care for wounded and disabled soldiers during the War of Independence. Currently, the ZDVO has 48,000 members and has established four Beit Halochem rehabilitation centres in Israel. Their Web site also has a picture gallery and profiles a disabled veteran every month [http://www.fidv-bh.com/].

On Yom Hazikaron, Israel's political, military and religious leaders gather at Israel's main military cemetery at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl. You can take a 360-degree look at one section of the cemetery online [http://shlk.com/49].

For more Yom Hazikaron links, check out Aj6 Online [http://www.aj6.org/jpbo/410/] and the Israel Defence Force Web site [http://www.idf.il/hebrew/links/links.stm]. The International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers' Web site was not operating when I checked it but may now be back [http://www.mia.org.il/].

It is almost impossible to understand the grief of a small country that has given up 20,000 of its young. That's why an article about the loss of one soldier has such an impact. In "His name was Nachshon Wachsman," Esther Wachsman, explains how her son was kidnapped and held ransom by Hamas in October 1994. The IDF launched a military rescue that failed and Nachshon and the commander of rescue mission were both killed [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yomhazikaron/].

"The entire nation mourned with us," Esther Wachsman writes. "Thousands came to comfort us, though no one can comfort a bereaved parent… Food and drink were delivered non-stop to our home; bus and taxi drivers who brought people from all over the country who wished to express their condolences, left their vehicles and joined their passengers in our home. That unity, solidarity, caring, compassion and love with which we were showered gave us strength and filled our hearts with love for our people. After the shivah, we all returned to our routines… for that is what the Jewish people have always done – rebuilt after destruction, began new lives from the ashes and blood of the old."

The myth of the wandering Jew

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It was not uncommon among large Sephardi families to send their sons abroad at a very early age. My grandmother's brother was barely bar mitzvah when his family dispatched him to Argentina in search of his own fortune. At the time, it must have been like sending one into another world. Indeed, his mother never saw this son again. Certainly there was contact by way of the letters they exchanged, but this correspondence could take up to six months.

I was always fascinated that my grandmother, who was born in 1900, just after her brother had left, went through life never meeting him. Here too, there were letters, photographs, even telephone calls, but the two never met.

Just recently, I met a grandson of that man, and while embracing him for the first time, I could not help but think that I was closing a circle of more than 100 years that our families had been separated.

Separation of families is not particular to anyone. Papierne kinder (paper children) is an old Yiddish saying. That's what the children who had left eastern Europe for the "New World" were called. These children would send pictures of themselves to their parents back home, pictures that were lovingly tucked into the frames of mirrors. There they would be looked at often and with longing. With marriages and births, more pictures would arrive and all of these too would be proudly displayed. But these children would sadly and cynically be known as papierne kinder – paper children – for they were too distant to be much more than that.

Was it always so? Was this the reality of the Diaspora, the scene of the ever-wandering Jew, a perpetually migrating people, as dislocated as they were disconnected from each other?

Not really.

The wandering Jew is more myth than fact. True, there were migrations and there were expulsions and persecutions, but, by and large, Jews tended to settle themselves in one place for hundreds of years at a stretch. In the case of Poland and the Rhineland, it was for 1,000 years; arguably, in Babylon (Iraq), it was for 2,000 years. Extended families lived as communities for generations, all in one place.

It was mainly in the 20th century that this stability changed. Pogroms, poverty versus opportunity, world wars and the Holocaust all contributed to this dispersal of families. Ironically, one other significant factor in separating families was (and remains) the State of Israel. The big question was whether to live in the Land of Israel or not. Some did, some did not. Despite the situation in Israel today, the prayer "and gather us from the four corners of the world" remains at least as valid as it always was. Clearly, the State of Israel is the beginning of a process that is still playing itself out.

So another anniversary for Israel approaches, albeit one tainted by terrorism with tragedy and uncertainty. Still, there is much to be grateful for and reason to celebrate. Not one thing should be taken for granted, and yet a world without Israel is inconceivable.

Just as HaShem deemed us worthy as a people to be blessed with the modern State of Israel, may He find merit in us not only to keep His gift in safety, but also to complete His promise of the "ingathering of the exiles from the four corners of the world" so that we may live our lives together as a family.

JWI steps out against domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Women International of Canada's (JWI) third annual Walk for Hope is set this year for April 21.

The walk, which was first held in Montreal, promotes awareness and raises funds for JWI's domestic violence programs.

Walks are set to take place at the same time in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, says Juliette Hershkovich who has chaired the Toronto walk since its inception. "People across the country are walking for the issue."

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI/Canada, says there is an ongoing reluctance in the Jewish community to discuss domestic violence.

"People who really know about things do not believe that it goes on in the Jewish community. The truth is, domestic violence happens in our community in the same proportion as in the community at large," says Krowitz.

"There is a shande attached to any family breakdown and too many Jewish women feel that if they come forward, they will let their families down.

"It is important to hold events such as this so women know there are resources available to them, and that they are not alone," she says.

JWI's projects include a rabbi's guide to domestic violence, which alerts rabbis to the signs of physical, psychological, financial and sexual abuse, and a guide for community workers.

The organization also distributes a pamphlet titled Protect Yourself, which offers concrete advice for any woman who is planning to leave an abuse situation. It is available in such places as doctor's offices, shelters or hospital emergency rooms – "any place where women who need help may gather."

To date, the organization has distributed about 150,000 pamphlets in English, French, Hebrew and Russian.

As well, together with Jewish Family & Child Service, JWI runs ASTEH, Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing, a kosher apartment – there are also apartments in Montreal and Winnipeg – for women who have fled their home and have nowhere else to go.

Alternate arrangements can be made for a woman who comes for help when the apartment is already in use, says Krowitz.

For the first time this year, the walk is a family event, says Krowitz. It takes place at Centerpoint Mall, from 10 a.m. to noon; registration is at 9:30 a.m.

They are planning to have a DJ, face painting, a tattoo artist and special prizes for the first 30 kids who register. Every registrant who obtains $25 in pledges gets a T-shirt.

After signing in, registrants have the choice of taking the simultaneous indoor or outdoor walk, says Krowitz.

For more information or to obtain a pledge form, call JWI at 416-630-9313.

8:00 pm - OPENING NIGHT FESTIVITIES
9:15 pm - SCHMELVIS: SEARCHING FOR THE KING'S JEWISH ROOTS WORLD PREMIERE
CANADA, 2001, 76 min.
Writer / Director: Max Wallace

Was The King of Rock 'n Roll "kosher"? Following up on a Wall Street Journal story that Elvis' great-great grandmother was Jewish, leads a diverse group of Montrealers, including an ultra Orthodox Jewish Elvis impersonator, a Rabbi and the filmmakers, on a quest to Memphis to find out what Elvis' fans think of this revelation. A hoot!
Writer / director / producer Max Wallace, producer Evan M. Beloff and executive producer Ari A. Cohen will be in attendance.

Sunday, April 21

11:00 am - MOTL DER OPERATOR (MOTL THE OPERATOR)
USA, 1939, 88 min.
Yiddish with English subtitles
Director: Joseph Seiden

Newly restored version of a seminal Yiddish classic about a labour dispute in the garment district of New York City.

1:00 pm - FORGING IDENTITY: HISTORY UNDER COVER
FRANCE, 1999, 52 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Jacques Faick

Adolfo (Joseph) Kaminsky was a real-life master forger who survived the Holocaust and saved thousands of Jews by forging their documents. Utterly compelling.
With the short film KIVNIK (23 min.)

2:45 pm - THE OPTIMISTS: THE STORY OF THE RESCUE OF THE BULGARIAN JEWS FROM THE HOLOCAUST
USA, 2000, 82 min.
Hebrew and Bulgarian with English subtitles
Director : Jacky Comforty

A heartfelt paean to genuine heroism. Why and how did the small country of Bulgaria manage to save all of its 50,000 Jews?

4:45 pm - KINKY FRIEDMAN: PROUD TO BE AN ASSHOLE FROM EL PASO
NETHERLANDS, 2001, 54 min.
Director: Simone de Vries

Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys were a popular '70's country rock band, with protest-inducing ditties like "Ride 'Em, Jewboy", which dealt with the Holocaust. In the 1980's, Friedman remade himself as a murder mystery author and has 15 (to date) novels to his credit. A rich portrait of a true original.

With the short films THE NOSE JOB JEW (5 min.) and MORTIMER GRIFFIN & SHALINSKY (24 min.)
Kinky Friedman may be in attendance.

7:00 pm - THE BELIEVER
USA, 2001, 98 min.
Writer / Director: Henry Bean
Cast: Ryan Gosling, Summer Phoenix, Billy Zane, Theresa Russell

A stunning piece of work. A Nazi skinhead's virulent anti-Semitism disguises the fact that he was born a Jew. As a reporter from The New York Times begins to uncover his secret, he is forced toward a final resolution of his demons.
Warning: Brutal violence
Writer / Director Henry Bean may be in attendance.

9:30 pm - FLORENTENE III
ISRAEL, 1999, 137 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Arik Rothstein

The third and final season of Florentene, Israel's most popular television serial, chronicling the experiences of a group of gay and straight twentysomethings living and loving in Tel Aviv.

See Wednesday, April 24, 9:30 pm

3:00 pm - FIGHTER
USA, 2000, 88 min.
English, Czech with English subtitles
Director: Amir Bar-Lev

In the summer of 1988, two Czech-American Holocaust survivors, 72-year-old Arnost Lustig and 77-year-old Jan Wiener, took a trip back to the Czech Republic, Slovenia and Italy, accompanied by a camera crew. A profile of two remarkable men.

5:00 pm - TILL DEATH DO US PART
ISRAEL, 1998, 59 min.
English, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Nili Tal

In 1991, 19-year-old Einav Rogel was brutally murdered by her jealous boyfriend. Powerfully examines hidden domestic violence and asks how and why this case ended in death.
Director Nili Tal will be in attendance.

7:00 pm - LATE MARRIAGE
ISRAEL / FRANCE, 2001, 100 min.
Hebrew, Georgian with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Dover Kosashvili

Handsome, charming and talented, 31-year-old Zaza would seem to have it all, except a wife and children. A ribald, cutting and perceptive film. Winner of nine Israeli Academy Awards.
Warning: This film contains scenes of explicit sex and strong sexuality
With the short film EXPECTING (25 min.)

9:30 pm - SLUMS OF BEVERLY HILLS
USA, 1998, 91 min.
Writer / Director: Tamara Jenkins
Cast: Natasha Lyonne, Alan Arkin, Marisa Tomei, Lisa Kudrow, Carl Reiner

Tamara Jenkins' semi-autobiographical drama stars Alan Arkin as a shady, desperate Beverly Hills salesman, one step ahead of the law and the landlord. A unique, original road movie.
With the short films AVENUE AMY (12 min.) and GRRLYSHOW (18 min.)

Tuesday, April 23

11:00 am - THE BOMBING
ISRAEL, 1999, 59 min.
English, Hebrew, Arabic with English subtitles
Director: Simone Bitton

In 1997, three Palestinian suicide bombers blew themselves up in downtown Jerusalem. Among the five Israelis who died were three teenage girls. Simone Bitton interviews the families of the girls and also those of the terrorists. A hopeful cry for a peace that has yet to be.
With the short film AS IF NOTHING HAPPENED (47 min.)

1:15 pm - TAQASIM
ISRAEL, 2000, 43 min.
Hebrew, Arabic with English subtitles
Director: Duki Dror

Israeli violinist Felix Mizrahi retains a strong attachment to his Egyptian roots. He's also haunted by the memory of his older musician brother. When Felix returns to Cairo, he discovers that music has no borders.
With the short film DUST (29 min.)

3:00 p.m. - BROTHER DANIEL – THE LAST JEW
ISRAEL, 2001, 57 min.
Hebrew, German with English subtitles
Director: Amir Gera

Brother Daniel is Oswald Rufeisen, who became Catholic during the war but still maintained that he was born and would die a Jew. His case before the Israeli Supreme Court rocked the nation.
With the short film THE SECRET (47 min.)

5:30 pm - THE ACCUSED
UNITED KINGDOM, 2001, 46 min.
English, Arabic with English subtitles
Producer: Aidan Laverty

In 1982, Christian Lebanese Phalangists massacred more than 800 Palestinian refugees in Israeli-controlled West Beirut. Ariel Sharon, now the Israeli Prime Minister, headed Israel's military at that time. How responsible was he for the bloodbath?
Producer Aidan Laverty will be in attendance.

7:15 pm - MAMADRAMA: THE JEWISH MOTHER IN CINEMA
US / AUSTRALIA, 2001, 73 min.
English, Yiddish, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Monique Schwarz

Why has the Jewish mother been portrayed the way she has, in Yiddish, American and Israeli films? The answers will surprise you. Among the interviewed experts are film critics Michael Medved and J. Hoberman, and directors Paul Mazursky and Larry Peerce.
Director Monique Schwarz will be in attendance.

THE 10TH ANNUAL Toronto Jewish Film Festival

FESTIVAL AT A GLANCE

9:30 pm - LEO UND CLAIRE
GERMANY, 2000, 105 min.
German with English subtitles
Director: Joseph Vilsmaier

Leo Katzenberger, a real-life prosperous German Jew, was condemned to death by guillotine in 1934 for an alleged affair with a Christian woman. The Nazis brought Leo to trial under the Nuremberg Laws, which forbade sexual relations between Jews and gentiles. His case became a cause célèbre.
With the short film SILENT SONG (6 min.)

Wednesday, April 24

11:00 am - UNDERDOGS (TJFF Retro)
ISRAEL, 1996, 85 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Directors: Doron Tsabari, Rino Tzror

A documentary look at religious divisions, societal expectations and Israel's obsessive sports culture, Underdogs is the fairy tale story of the Beit Shean soccer team, which has made it to Israel's National Soccer League.
With the short film THE WORST JEWISH FOOTBALL TEAM IN THE WORLD (9 min.)

1:00 pm - LEO UND CLAIRE
See Tuesday, April 23, 9:30 pm

3:00 pm - "TERRORISTS" IN RETIREMENT
FRANCE, 1983, 83 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Mosco Boucault

Banned in France! The Nazis executed 24 mostly Jewish Resistance fighters in 1944, in France. Condemned as "Jewish, foreign–born communists and terrorists"—although they never targeted civilians—the men were abandoned and possibly betrayed by the French Resistance and the French Communist party.
With the short film 1939 (9 min.)

5:15 pm - A BOMB IN THE BASEMENT: ISRAEL'S NUCLEAR OPTION
ISRAEL, 2001, 79 min.
English, Hebrew, French with English subtitles
Director: Michael Karpin

A controversial and riveting documentary about secret contacts, skullduggery and personal infighting. It dispels the myth of Israeli nuclear confidence even as it lays out the urgency Israeli leaders felt about getting nuclear weaponry to stave off its hostile Arab neighbours.
Director Michael Karpin will be in attendance.

7:15 pm - THE MAD ADVENTURES OF 'RABBI' JACOB
FRANCE, 1974, 96 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Gérard Oury

This uproarious comedy about a bigoted French businessman who is forced to pose as a Chasidic Rabbi stars Louis de Funès, one of France's most beloved performers. In its rarely seen subtitled version.
With the short film LA VIE, LA MORT ET LE FOOT (8 min.)

9:30 pm - KEEP ON WALKING
USA, 2000, 52 min.
Directors: Freke Vuijst, Tana Ross, Jesper Sorensen, Vibeke Winding

Joshua Nelson is a gospel singer, preacher and African-American Jew. Raised by his Jewish mother, he's managed to integrate his religion and profession as he travels from his home in Newark, New Jersey, spreading his word throughout the U.S. and beyond. It's a fascinating musical journey.
Joshua Nelson will be in attendance.

Thursday, April 25

11:00 am - AUTUMN SUN (TJFF Retro)
ARGENTINA, 1996, 103 min.
Spanish with English subtitles
Director: Eduardo Mignogna

Norma Aleandro stars as an independent but lonely Jewish single woman living in Buenos Aires. Anticipating a visit from her judgmental brother from Boston, she advertises for a Jewish boyfriend in the personals. A Movies 4 Mommies programme.

1:00 pm - A JEWISH WEDDING (TJFF Retro)
UK, 1997, 50 min.
Director: Stephen Walker

She's Jewish, he's not. Their impending nuptials provide a quirky window on one couple's inter-marriage experiences.
With the short film CHICKS IN WHITE SATIN (30 min.)

3:00 pm - L'CHAYIM, COMRADE STALIN!
USA, 2002, 94 min.
English, Russian, Yiddish with English subtitles
Director: Yale Strom

Twenty years before the birth of modern Israel, Stalin established the Jewish Autonomous Region of Birobidzhan in the Soviet Union's Far East. It survives to this day.
Director Yale Strom will be in attendance.

5:30 pm - TED ALLAN: MINSTREL BOY OF THE 20TH CENTURY
CANADA, 2002, 57 min.
Directors: Merrily Weisbord, Tanya Ballantyne Tree

The late Ted Allan was a renowned playwright, screenwriter and author. Footage of Allan's readings, and his own comments on his career and life, create a unique portrait of a unique individual in this director's cut.
Co-director Merrily Weisbord, a close friend of Ted Allan, will be in attendance.

7:15 pm - CLEAN SWEEP (MARS TURKY)
ISRAEL, 2000, 94 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Oded Davidoff

A salacious, offbeat and very twisted cop drama. Clean Sweep opens with two uniquely vicious murders and then segues into an explosive thriller. From the new generation of Israeli filmmakers.
With the short film JAILBIRDS (15 min.)

9:30 pm - SOBIBOR, OCTOBER 14, 1943, 4 PM
Co – presented with Cinematheque Ontario
FRANCE, 2001, 97 min.
French, Hebrew with English subtitles
Director: Claude Lanzmann

A story of genuine heroism. Jewish prisoners led by a Soviet Red Army officer killed 12 German guards at the Sobibor concentration camp, freeing 365 inmates, in October 1943. One of the rebellion's leaders, Yehuda Lerner, was interviewed in depth in 1979 by director Claude Lanzmann.

Friday, April 26

11:00 am - A TICKLE IN THE HEART (TJFF Retro)
GERMANY/USA, 1996, 84 min.
Director: Stephan Schwietert

Max, Willie and Julie Epstein, three elderly New York brothers, were once the top klezmorim around. Genuine characters and terrific raconteurs, the Epsteins play, sing and perform, nowhere more touchingly than in Berlin.

1:00 pm - SOBIBOR, OCTOBER 14, 1943, 4 PM
See Thursday, April 25, 9:30 pm

3:00 pm - MY DEAR CLARA
CANADA, 2001, 48 min.
Director: Garry Beitel

When Montrealer Clara Greenspan, director Beitel's aunt, died, he found a cache of letters written to her husband Chaim Blum, whom she had married in Berlin. Theirs was a love story via the mail, which told of a separation caused by Canada's stringent, sexist and anti-Semitic immigration laws.
Director Garry Beitel will be in attendance.
With the short film TSIPA AND VOLF (20 min.)

5:00 pm - BLACKS AND JEWS (TJFF Retro)
USA, 1996, 85 min.
Directors: Alan Snitow/Deborah Kaufman

Once staunch allies, the Jewish and Black communities in the US have undergone strains and tensions in their relationships. Shines a light on an underreported, occasionally shameful reality.

Saturday, April 27

9:15 pm - TIME OF FAVOR (HAHESDER)
ISRAEL, 2001, 94 min.
Hebrew with English subtitles
Writer / Director: Joseph Cedar

Director Joseph Cedar, an Orthodox Jew, does not ignore the perils of fanaticism. His award-winning Time of Favour postulates the unthinkable: a plot by religious Jews to destroy the fabled Al-Aqsa Mosque. One of the more original and acclaimed Israeli films of recent years.
With the short film QUESTIONS (17 min.)

Sunday, April 28

12:00 noon - THE INNER TOUR
Co-presented with Hot Docs
An Israeli-Palestinian co-production,
2001, 99 min.
Hebrew, Arabic with English subtitles
Director: Ra'anan Alexandrowicz

Before the current round of Israeli-Palestinian violence, the only way for ordinary Palestinians who didn't work in Israel to visit the country was to take a guided tour. A fascinating account of one such "sightseeing" trip undertaken in 2000. In the vein of Promises, an evocative plea for peace.

2:30 pm - JE ME SOUVIENS
CANADA, 2002, 45 min.
French with English subtitles
Director: Eric R. Scott

The hateful language of Quebec nationalist icon Lionel Groulx and scholar Esther Délisle's exposé of the man's racism, are among the touchstones of this probing film, which begins in the 1930's and moves to the present.
Director Eric R. Scott will be in attendance.
With the short film THE STREET (10 min.)

4:15 pm - MINYAN IN KAIFENG
USA, 2001, 73 min.
English, Chinese with English subtitles
Directors: Steven Calcote, Jonathan Shulman
Narrated by Leonard Nimoy

What is a Jew? In 1997, twelve young Jews from the USA, Israel and Australia, all living in China, decided to find out what remained of the ancient Jewish community of Kaifeng in northern China.
With the short film UNHEARD VOICES (11 min.)

6:30 pm - STRANGE FRUIT
USA, 2001, 57 min.
Director: Joel Katz
Narrated by Dorothy Thigpen

Few people know that singer Billie Holiday's "Strange Fruit", the controversial song about the shameful lynching of Afro-Americans, was written by a Jewish schoolteacher from the Bronx named Abel Meeropol. That's only one fascinating fact revealed in Joel Katz's illuminating look at one of the most disquieting and impactful songs ever to emerge from popular culture.
With the short film A RIGHTEOUS MAN: NELSON MANDELA AND THE JEWS OF SOUTH AFRICA (24 min.)

8:45 pm - THE GREY ZONE
USA, 2001, 108 min.
Writer / Director: Tim Blake Nelson
Cast: David Arquette, Steve Buscemi, Harvey Keitel, Mira Sorvino, and Daniel Benzali

Director/actor Tim Blake Nelson's ("O, Brother, Where Art Thou?") devastating film focuses on the 12th Sonderkommando unit at Auschwitz, which revolted against their Nazi masters in 1944, destroying half of the camp's ovens. Superbly acted, The Grey Zone is one of the finest, most humane and important Holocaust movies ever made.
Warning: This film contains scenes of brutal violence.

Small Jewish-Muslim group meets near U of T

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two graduate students – one a Conservative rabbi, the other a Canadian-born Muslim – have created what they call a reading circle, in which a small group of Jews and Muslims study and discuss mystical texts from their respective faiths.

Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, 31, and Atif Khalil, 26, met – aptly – at the Centre for the Study of Religion at the University of Toronto.

Although they had discussed the possibility of some sort of dialogue group for a year or so after they met, they agree that it's likely the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 were the catalyst that kick-started their project.

But there is "an unspoken agreement that we never engage in politics. We're there to explore the religion of the heart," said Rabbi Glazer in a joint interview with Khalil at Hart House. "Our hope is that through engaging in the common path of these religions of the heart, we'll be able to come with new eyes to the political [aspect]."

The events of Sept. 11 "made us realize even more, how important something like this was," said Khalil, who has started his PhD in Medieval Islamic Philosophy and Sufism (Islamic mysticism). He added that he believes there was greater receptivity to the group in the wake of the attacks on the United States.

At the group's most recent meeting, held in March near the U of T campus, Khalil and Rabbi Glazer, who facilitate the discussions, were joined by two Jewish participants. The meeting was atypical, they said, both in size and composition. Past meetings have had up to 13 participants, with the majority of them Muslim. Most are graduate students, some are members of the community.

The meetings begin and end with a prayer and a prolonged moment of silence. As a rule, an hour is devoted to Muslim texts, and an hour to Jewish ones.

"I'm proud of this group," said Franci Williams, the senior participant of the small group by more than a decade. "I think it's a mitzvah. I'm extremely interested in mystical text. The political statement that we're making in terms of the closeness that we're achieving – we're expressing our humanity together."

"I don't know of any group in Israel that is like this," said Israeli-born Gur Zak, 26, a PhD student in medieval and renaissance studies.

Rabbi Glazer knew of one, but Zak found the idea hard to fathom because, in Israel, "religion is so connected with politics."

The Sufi texts and three from Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, the first chief rabbi of Israel – which were the basis for that evening's discussion – examine concepts like love, good and evil. Participants spent the evening analyzing and discussing in a way that was almost palpably gentle. A sense of calm prevailed around the table.

Any conclusions relating to politics were implicit, not expressed aloud. But at the meetings, generally, there is "a sense that when you sit around a table together, drinking tea [and having this kind of dialogue], that this is the most real thing there is," said Rabbi Glazer.

CJN town hall meeting to address anti-Semitism on campus

TORONTO — Three speakers will address the issue of anti-Semitism on campus at a town hall meeting being sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News on May 7 at the Barbara Frum Library.

Michael Jankelowitz, Washington, D.C.-based director, of Campus Israel Affairs, Hillel and representative of the Jewish Agency of Israel, will deliver the keynote address at the Tuesday evening event titled Anti-Semitism on Campus: Helping our Students Cope. He will talk from a global perspective.

Joining him will be Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, which is helping to facilitate the event. Kaye will focus on the local situation and the needs of Jewish students in order to respond. There will also be a student on the panel, and CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat will moderate.

"It's a devastating time," Kaye said in an interview last week. "Even though the campus year will be over [in May], the forum will provide us with an important opportunity to assess what has been happening on campuses worldwide and locally, and to evaluate what we as a Jewish campus community have been doing in a proactive manner, as well as reacting to the negative views on Israel. It will allow us to learn some lessons of this past year as we begin to prepare for the upcoming academic year."

Kaye, whose career as a Jewish campus professional dates back to 1983 and spans three continents, said the situation is not the worst he's seen. "In Canada there's still a semblance of equanimity – the Canadian sense of fair play – but it's diminishing."

In the year and a half since the intifadah began, the atmosphere on campus has become "more charged with overt hostility toward Jews, not just toward Israel," said Ben-Dat. The hostility is particularly pronounced in Europe, but Canada is not exempt, he added.

"It takes great personal courage and personal presence to be able to withstand that kind of hostile peer pressure on campus," Ben-Dat said.

The upcoming event will be the fifth in a series of town hall meetings and round table discussions initiated by the newspaper in October 1998.

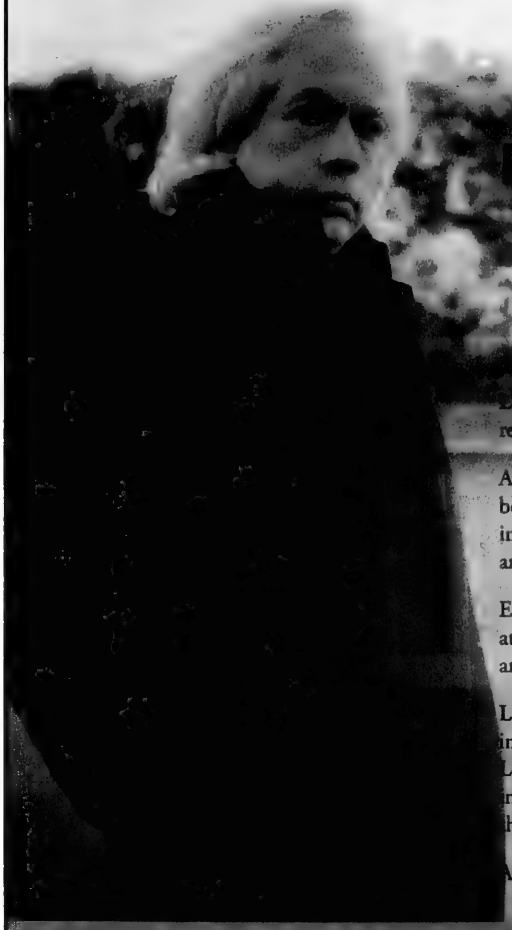
The Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg Spring Author's Lecture



The Language We Lack: Reflections on Jewish Literacy

(with reflections on the current crisis)

Leon Wieseltier

Tuesday, April 23, 2002, at 8 p.m.

Leon Wieseltier, one of the most extraordinary Jews of our time, has long been recognized as an intellectual prodigy, yet one with street smarts.

A child of Holocaust survivors, he grew up in Brooklyn and, at a young age, became the Literary Editor of the New Republic Magazine, perhaps the most influential American journal of our time. He is also the author of Kaddish, and Nuclear War, Nuclear Peace.

Eclectic in his interests, Wieseltier has two passions for the Jewish People: our attachment to the State and People of Israel; and our knowledge of our religious and historic texts.

Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg have endowed this annual spring lecture as an important program of the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning at Holy Blossom Temple. We are grateful to both couples for their belief in Holy Blossom and support of important public events that serve to bring together the entire community.

Canada's Mideast comments under fire

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish leaders expressed frustration, disappointment and bewilderment at last week's pronouncements by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham on the escalating crisis in Israel.

Jewish officials are seeking an urgent meeting with Graham to clarify Canada's stand, which has become increasingly critical of Israel over the past 10 days, beginning with an April 1 policy statement from the Department of Foreign Affairs that condemned Israel for its "disproportionate use" of military force against Palestinians.

Jewish leaders say this country is not offering any alternatives to the violence, and is being hypocritical in its condemnation of Israel's fight against terrorism just as Canadian soldiers pursue terrorists in Afghanistan.

After a conspicuous period of silence, Canada weighed in on the violence.

First, Graham, in an April 2 conference call with reporters, including one from The CJN, said Canada backs a United Nations resolution calling for Israel's withdrawal from Palestinian cities. At the same time, he accused Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat of sabotaging peace efforts for failing to stop, or even condemn, suicide attacks against Israeli civilians.

Graham's remarks were described as "baffling and contradictory" by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Two days later, Chrétien, while on an official visit to Morocco, bluntly called on Israel to pull its troops from Palestinian cities and towns and return to a "dialogue" with the Palestinians.

While acknowledging that the situation facing Israeli civilians is "terrifying," Chrétien rebuked Israel for failing to comply with UN Resolution 1402, which calls for a ceasefire by both sides, and the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Palestinian cities, including Ramallah.

Said Chrétien: "There are a lot of civilians dying on both sides... If you live in Israel, and people come and blow themselves up in front of families and so on, it's extremely terrifying. But on the other hand, they have to [return to] dialogue and they should respect the resolution of the United Nations that has asked the tanks to go back on the other side of the border. The violence will lead nowhere."

The prime minister called on Palestinian authorities to "convince" potential suicide bombers that their actions will lead "nowhere." He also endorsed the establishment of a Palestinian state "eventually, as soon as possible."

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the CIC, told The CJN that while he's "appreciative" that Chrétien understands the plight of Israelis "and that he recognized [Israel's] initial need to respond," the prime minister's remarks are nonetheless "unfortunate and not going to be helpful."

Chrétien, said Wilder, doesn't take into account that should Israel leave Palestinian areas, "nothing would be achieved because the Palestinians would see it as defeat for Israel, just as they perceived Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon as a defeat."

Wilder suggested Chrétien "ought to be suggesting an alternative."

Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, used blunter language.

"This is a clear-cut issue," he told The CJN. "There can't be any distinction between what any other other democratic country is obliged to do in the war against terrorism and what Israel is doing now. This is hardly the time for Canada to be seeking to play its traditional [even-handed] role."

Canada's Jewish community "needs its government to be forthright and give its full support to Israel. There's no room for hypocrisy or double standards. When you're dealing with 26 deaths at a Passover seder or 19 deaths in a discotheque [resulting from suicide bombings], all bets are off. At this point, Israel is obliged to do what any democratic country is obliged to do, which is hunt down murderers."

In his call with reporters, Graham warned that Israel's "disproportionate use of force and the reoccupation of Palestinian-controlled areas will lead to further violence." He did not define what a proportionate response would be.

Canada "totally condemns" suicide bomb attacks, which are "an affront to everyone and an affront to the attempt to make peace.

"I think the suicide bomber attacks make Israel naturally react to defend itself... and then that starts a process going again that makes it much more difficult to achieve peace."

(Later in the week, Graham came out in full support of U.S. President George W. Bush's call for an immediate Mideast ceasefire.)

Graham also accused Arafat of talking about peace in English, while refusing to tell his followers in Arabic that suicide bombings must end. "This is where we have a real dispute with Chairman Arafat," Graham said.

And he cast doubt on Israel's strategy: "I don't think Israel, by rooting out Mr. Arafat, is going to accomplish the end game of peace."

Responding to a question from The CJN, Graham said he was postponing his trip to the Middle East, tentatively scheduled for later this month, saying that "I would prefer to go when it can be useful."

In a statement, Wilder said he was "baffled by the inherent contradictions" in Graham's approach.

While Graham affirmed Israel's right to self-defence, "he then turns around and faults Israel for exercising this right of self-defence by going after the sources of terrorism in the same way that Canadian and U.S. forces are seeking to defeat terrorism in Afghanistan," Wilder said.

He added that Graham can't claim Palestinian suicide bombings are designed to destroy the peace process, and then blame Israel's presence in the West Bank – "meant only to stop these suicide bombings – for making prospects for peace impossible."

Canada-Israel trade doubles in last five years

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two-way trade between Canada and Israel broke the $1 billion mark last year for the first time, recently released figures show.

Since the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA) came into force a little over five years ago, bilateral trade has doubled, while Canadian exports to Israel have jumped by more than 30 per cent.

Last year was a milestone. Canadian exports to Israel totalled over $350 million in 2001, while imports from Israel were valued at above $600 million. The free trade deal does not cover services, which were estimated at over $100 million last year.

According to a report entitled The CIFTA at 5 Years: Celebrating a Quiet Success, put out by Canada's department of foreign affairs and international trade, the free trade pact, in light of similar deals between Israel and the United States, and Israel and the European Union, "has created a more level playing field for Canadian exports."

Canada's major exports to Israel, the report states, have been machinery, electrical equipment, engine parts, aluminum, paper and paperboard, wood pulp, cereals, sulphur and asbestos, optical measuring and checking equipment, and wood and synthetic fibres.

Canada's imports from Israel, meantime, have doubled over the last five years. Diamonds, mechanical and electrical machinery and equipment make up the bulk of this country's imports from Israel.

Under the agreement, tariffs have been eliminated on virtually all manufactured goods. As well, 80 per cent of agricultural and agri-food products are duty-free or at a reduced tariff.

Certain dairy, poultry and egg products are excluded from the agreement, at Canada's request, while some textiles are not covered, at Israel's request.

"We are pleased but not complacent," Benjamin Noy, Israel's trade commissioner to Canada, told The CJN. "We see a lot of progress still ahead. We believe the potential is much higher," especially in joint ventures.

Noy added that the real trade figures are higher than those reflected in official statistics because they include exchanges of know-how and computer software.

The increased trade last year over the year before is all the more remarkable given the worldwide economic slowdown, Noy said.

Negotiations between the two countries continue to knock down more duties on agricultural and food products.

A major success story has been in the area of Canadian pet foods, which, as a result of free trade, have captured a large share of the Israeli market. Loblaws' President's Choice brand pet food has reached eight per cent penetration of Israeli private-label sales, and is the leading President's Choice product in Israel.

The federal report states that excellent opportunities for Canadian businesses in the Israeli market lie in information and communication technology, and transportation. Good opportunities also exist in aerospace, construction and the environment

Another success story between the two countries has been the construction of Israel's first all-electronic toll highway. In 1998, Derech Eretz Ltd., an international consortium, was awarded the $1.2 billion contract to design, finance, build and operate the 86-kilometre Cross-Israel Highway, with the Canadian Highways International Consortium (CHIC) as a one-third equal partner. CHIC built the world's first electronic toll road, Highway 407, north of Toronto.

The Israeli highway is slated to open in 2004.

Meantime, the Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation (CIIRDF), established in 1994 to promote joint research and development, has invested more than $15 million in nearly 40 projects. Of those, seven have returned royalties totally nearly $1 million to the foundation.

Israel participating in stamp show

MONTREAL — The Israel Postal Authority is creating a special postmark to commemorate its participation in the Laval Stamp Expo April 19-21, sponsored in collaboration with the Canadian Stamp Dealers Association and the Philatelic Federation of Quebec.

"It will be the first time that Israel has participated in an important Canadian stamp show since the CAPEX International Stamp Show that was held in Toronto in 1996," said Sammy Berger, director of the New York-based Israel Philatelic Agency of North America.

At that time, Israel released a special showcard that commemorated Canada Post's new Holocaust stamp.

The first 200 visitors to the Israel booth at the Laval Stamp Expo on Friday and Sunday will be given a free Israeli souvenir sheet. The booth will display the latest stamps issued by Israel, which may be purchased at face value.

Stamps will be cancelled with the souvenir postmark on the same days. The Israel booth will be closed on Saturday.

Older stamps from Israel will be on sale at the Judaica Sales Reg'd. booth, the largest Israel stamp dealer in Canada.

"Israel stamps in and of themselves are a tremendous teaching tool in that they portray biblical events, historical and Zionist events, as well as mirror the creation and subsequent growth of the State of Israel," said Judaica Sales owner Isidore Baum.

One clarifying report amid many

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With the flood of analyses and commentaries bombarding us about Israel at this perilous moment in its history, it is essential to sift through the torrent in order to find that rare gem that yields clarity.

Tom Friedman of the New York Times provided this insight in his March 31 column, "Suicidal lies." It should be required reading for everyone, especially those journalists who insist on spreading the blame evenly between Israelis and the Palestinian leaders for the horrific state of violence; who insist that there is a "cycle of violence," implying a moral equivalence between Palestinian terrorism and Israel's defensive actions; and who, having been influenced by the TV images of Israel's military operations in the territories, quickly forget the cause of the operations – terrorism – and end up placing the onus on Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon instead of on the principal culprit, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Friedman's article offers a corrective to all the above distortions and more. It brilliantly sets the record straight: there is simply no excuse for the Palestinians to lash out with violence and terrorism, which is all too often rationalized by some members of the media romantically imbued with liberation struggles – even those led by corrupt autocrats – as "justified resistance to occupation."

As Friedman explains, in July 2000 at Camp David, then prime minister Ehud Barak offered Arafat the chance for Palestinian statehood in virtually all of the West Bank and Gaza. Arafat rejected the offer, made no counter proposal, and a mere two months later began a campaign of violence. The violence was not about "occupation" (except if that word means, as it does for an increasing number of Palestinians, "all of Palestine" including Israel).

Rather, as Friedman put it, "The world must understand that the Palestinians have not chosen suicide bombing out of 'desperation' stemming from the Israeli occupation. That is a huge lie. Palestinians have adopted suicide bombing as a strategic choice. This threatens all civilization because if suicide bombing is allowed to work in Israel, then, like hijacking and airplane bombing, it will be copied and eventually lead to a bomber strapped with a nuclear device threatening entire nations. That is why the the whole world must see this Palestinian suicide strategy defeated."

Today Arafat is doing to Israel what he previously did to Jordan and then to Lebanon – wreaking havoc and destruction and, through a strategic miscalculation of historic dimensions, leading his people, once again, into a black hole. Tragically, he's taking Israelis, including those who had once been prepared to compromise with him, down there as well.

Sadly, frustratingly, for many – even for those who admit Arafat is "untrustworthy" and a "liar" (as he lied to U.S. President George W. Bush about his involvement in the Karine-A heavy arms shipment) – Arafat is viewed as a victim rather than the architect of his own misfortune, and the cause of an incredible, totally unnecessary amount of suffering for Israelis and Palestinians alike.

Modern anti-Semitism is largely an Arab phenomenon, says prof.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — On the subject of modern-day anti-Semitism, there's good news and there's bad news, says Aron Rodrigue, professor of history and Jewish studies at Stanford University.

The good news, he said, is that in the western world, anti-Semitism is no longer a significant and dangerous threat. The bad news is that the Arab world has taken over that vitriol, and its anti-Jewish resentment may have a long and bitter future.

Rodrigue, an author and scholar of ancient and modern Jewish history, delivered this message last month at Vancouver's Temple Sholom as part of the community's Chicken Soup for the Mind lecture series.

"There are no easy answers [to modern-day anti-Semitism,]" he said, before delving into the history of the term and its evolution over time.

The disturbing fact about anti-Semitism in the Arab world today is that historically, it's been a western phenomenon with no Arab equivalent, Rodrigue said.

"The irony of the situation is that Europe, which manufactured anti-Semitism, has exported it to areas where before there was none," he said. "When countries as far away as Pakistan are buying the panoply of the Jewish conspiracy theories, it's dangerous."

The establishment of the State of Israel has everything to do with the transference of anti-Semitism to the Arab world, and that's ironic too, Rodrigue said, because Israel was created to solve the problem.

But Israel has become a scapegoat for the Arab world's troubles. The overshadowing of Arab culture by the West is one source of resentment, which becomes focused on Israel, Rodrigue said.

You don't have to look far to find manifestations of Arab anti-Semitism, he said. "Just look in the newspaper. They don't use the word Israelis, they use the word Jews."

Asked how anti-Semitism in its modern form can be reduced or eliminated, Rodrigue shook his head sorrowfully.

"There's no easy answer. The way to make anti-Semitism less acute in the Arab world is to reach a peaceful solution to the Arab-Israeli problem, to remove it from being a constant irritant," he said.

"Jews make a mistake by trying to use logic to untangle anti-Semitism," he added. "It makes more sense to realize that anti-Semitism exists in a spectrum, and it's not coherent."

אלה ללא ספק ימים מחקשים ביותר שעברו אי פעם על ישראל. להוציא אולי את מלחמת יום כיפור, קשה לחשוב על מצב כל כך מפחיד. יושב אדם בליל חסדר במלון גדול בנתניה, כשנכנס לשם פלשתינאי חגור חומר נפץ שמפוצץ את עצמו עם מאות אנשים. האם יש ביטוי אנושישמי יותר חריף מזה ? במלחמת יום כיפור חיתה תאיקה קצרה יחסיית, ואילו עכשיו לא נראה כיצד זה יכול להסתיים. מידי יום נהרגים ישראלים בידי טרוריסטים. את דיעותי שלי השמעתי- אין ליהודים מה לשבת בין חרוצחים תאלה בגדה וברצועה. לגדל ילדים ישראלים בגדה ובעזה זה לדעתי חוסר אחריות. נכון, יש לנו זכויות על כל ארץ ישראל לפחות כמו לפלשתינאים, אבל החיים יותר חשובים מזכויות. צריכים לעשות הפרדה מוחלטת ביניהם ובין ישראל. האם האלימות תסתיים אי אפשר כמובן לצבא, אך זה יאפשר להיות חרבה יותר בפוקוס למצן נכון את הגבולות. מי שאומר שמעשי טרור כאלה אינם מחויים סכנה פיזית לישראל טועה לדעתי בגדול: רק תסתכלו על מספר האנשים שמממשים דרכונים במדינות שהוריחם או סביחם נולדו בהן. לי אישית אין שום ספק שישראל תפנה בסופו של דבר את הגדה ועזה. כל השאלה היא כמה ישראלים ישלמו בחייחם עד אז: מאה, אלף או עשרה אלפים. כשרופא רואה יד או רגל שנגועים בגנגרנה הוא מצווה לכרות את הגפה החולה כדי להציל את חגוף כולו. דבר אחד בטוח: הישיבה הישראלית בגדה ובעזה אינה משרחת את ישראל אסטרטגית ואף פעם לא תתקבל פוליטית. או מה- במאה השנים הקרובות ילדו חיילים ישראלים ילדים בגדה לבית הספרז זה אבסורד שאין כמותו.

Sharon seeks summit with 'moderate' Arab leaders

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told a special session of the Knesset on Monday that he was willing to meet "moderate" Arab leaders at a summit to hold peace talks "without any preconditions," and that once the IDF's operation in the territories ended, the army would withdraw to "specified" border locations.

"I am ready to go at any time and to any place to negotiate peace without any conditions," the prime minister said.

Referring to the Saudi initiative, Sharon said it had a "positive element," but that it would remain "empty of content" without dialogue between the sides. "No one side can impose terms on the other," he said.

But Sharon, who said he would discuss his plan with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, who arrived earlier this week in the region, made it clear Israel could not agree to the return of refugees to its territory.

Brandishing documents that he said linked Palestinian Authority Yasser Arafat to terrorist acts, Sharon began his address saying the Palestinian leader had created a "regime of terror" that systematically trained and dispatched terrorists to kill Israelis.

Sharon said the IDF's invasion of the West Bank was always intended to be "temporary," but that the operation would continue until the "terror infrastructure" in the territories had been dismantled. "We have no intention of permanently conquering the Palestinian cities. After the operation has been completed, the IDF will withdraw to specified buffer zones."

In a speech interrupted by stormy interjections from both left and right, the prime minister said Arafat was behind "gangs of murderers" that sought to drive Israelis from their homes, and that he was the dispatcher of the attacks that had rocked Israel for months.

Departing from Knesset practice in presenting documents before the parliament, Sharon said that, "What began as a fear and grew stronger into a suspicion, has turned into a solid fact that no one can deny: Arafat has established in the area under his rule a regime of terror, which in a governmental and organized manner trains terrorists... funds, equips and arms them, sends them into operations of killing across Israel."

He said one of the documents, which he said was captured in Arafat's office, showed the "price list of terrorism," with such listings as the cost of a suicide bombing operation.

Another document, Sharon said, was a letter addressed to "the fighting President, brother Abu Amar [Arafat]," asking for allocations of $1,500 for a number of Fatah militants, including at least one killed by Israeli forces. Yet another request for funds for fighters came from West Bank Fatah senior official Marwan Barghouti.

"The gangs of murderers have a leader... and the aim is to force us out of here," Sharon said. "The one who sends them is the head of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat."

(Arafat has repeatedly denied such accusations in the past, and has accused Sharon of using "terror tactics" as Israel tried to put down the Palestinian uprising.)

Addressing the Palestinian people, Sharon said: "We have no war against you and we do not want to control you. We want to live with you, side by side, with dignity and honour. [But] you must take your fate in your hands... You must reject the forces that have brought upon you catastrophe."

Toward the end of his address, Sharon announced his intention to add three new cabinet ministers, hardliners Effi Eitam and Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party and right-centrist David Levy of Gesher, a move which has sparked debate within Labor over whether to remain in the coalition.

Ron Arad had surgery in Lebanese hospital, court told

Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

BEIRUT — In the first indication in years that Ron Arad may still be alive, an alleged Israeli spy has provided information that the missing Israeli airman was operated on in a hospital, court documents show.

The reference to Arad, whose warplane was downed over Lebanon in 1986, came in a charge sheet demanding the death penalty for six Lebanese who are in military custody for allegedly spying for Israel.

Beirut newspapers published the full text of the charge sheet last week.

The charge sheet claimed that one of the alleged spies, Imad Hussein al-Rizz, who worked at the Middle East Hospital in south Beirut, had received information from a doctor at the same hospital that Arad was alive and had been operated on at Al-Ahly Hospital in eastern Lebanon.

Al-Rizz also allegedly learned that Arad had been transferred to the nearby Baalbek Hospital. Baalbek is a Hezbollah guerrilla stronghold.

Al-Rizz went to Italy in February and passed the information to an Israeli intelligence contact, receiving $3,000 (US) cash in return, the charges allege.

It was not clear when Arad was allegedly operated on or transferred or what surgery was performed.

But the claims marked the first time in years that specific information has been divulged about the Israeli airman, whose plane went down in southern Lebanon in October 1986 when a bomb on his jet went off prematurely. The pilot was rescued in a daring operation, but Arad was captured by Lebanese guerrillas, who reportedly gave him to Iranian agents.

The leader of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has said he has no details on Arad's whereabouts. He has previously promised to try to uncover Arad's fate so Hezbollah could trade him for Lebanese and other Arab prisoners in Israeli jails.

The charge sheet names the alleged members of the Israeli spy ring, which includes Hassan Hashem, a former prominent official of the Syrian-backed Shiite Muslim Amal militia.

IDF decides on limited draft of senior reserve officers in north

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The IDF decided late Sunday on a limited draft of senior reserve officers to provide reinforcement for soldiers on Israel's northern border.

Seven soldiers were injured by Hezbollah fire that day.

Senior Syrian and Lebanese sources in Damascus and Beirut said Sunday that they have no control over the militant Hezbollah organization, and rejected demands by the George W. Bush administration to restrain the group and thus prevent further escalation on Israel's northern border.

Lebanese leaders noted that they oppose actions currently taken by Hezbollah, including those in the Shaba Farms and Har Dov. Sources in Damascus said Syria is not interested in an escalation of tensions, and "does not control the situation."

A member of the U.S. administration estimated that Hezbollah had recently received large weapons caches from Iran, some of which Syria did not know about.

Seven IDF soldiers were wounded Sunday in two separate attacks by Hezbollah on Israeli military targets along the northern border.

Two were wounded in the afternoon – one moderately and the second lightly – when Hezbollah guerrillas fired mortars and anti-tank missiles at their IDF post in the Har Dov region. A short time later, five more soldiers were injured, two moderately and three lightly, when mortar shells were fired at an IDF outpost in Moshav Avivim, in the Upper Galilee.

The IDF troops replied with artillery shells, leading to a heavy exchange of fire. IAF helicopters were also mobilized in the area.

Hezbollah guerrillas have repeatedly fired at IDF posts over the past week. It claims that Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000 is incomplete and that the Har Dov area is Lebanese territory given to the country by Syria.

The United Nations, however, has recognized Israel's pullout from Lebanon after 18 years as complete and maintains that negotiations over the disputed region should be carried out between Israel and Syria.

Four Palestinians were detained by the Lebanese army for firing on an IDF post in the Arab village of Ghajar, Lebanese security officials said Sunday. When Hezbollah gunmen opened fire on the IDF post in Ghajar, five Israeli Arabs were injured Saturday evening. Three of the injured were members of one family, including a three-year-old boy who was taken by helicopter to the Rambam hospital in Haifa.

Hezbollah militants also fired on two other posts along Israel's northern border, one in the western Galilee area, and one in the Mount Hermon area. IDF troops returned fire.

For the first time since the IDF withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000, the Lebanese army began to increase its presence near the border with Israel. Lebanese newspapers published pictures on Saturday of Lebanese soldiers patrolling near the Kila village close to the Fatma gate. The papers reported that 400 soldiers were deployed in areas close to the border.

The redeployment came after the Lebanese army arrested six members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command in the Bekaa region on Friday. The six were charged with possession of surface-to-surface missiles and had a missile with them at the time of their arrest. Lebanese sources said security forces have arrested several other Palestinians in the past few days.

Lebanese state prosecutor, Adnan Addoum said Friday that Mohammed Alian, a Palestinian officer who is reportedly a member of Fatah, had been arrested en route to Tzur from the nearby Palestinian refugee camp of Ein el-Hilweh and that the security forces had found detonators for operating explosives on him.

Addoum said the Lebanese security and legal apparatuses would prevent hostilities of any sort from Lebanese territory.

The Lebanese defence minister, Khalil al-Hrawi said Saturday in Beirut that the "position of the Lebanese government is not to allow military operations over the blue line, which Lebanon recognizes."

Reiterating his country's support for Hezbollah's operations in the Shaba Farms area, however, al-Hrawi said Lebanon "reserves the right of resistance against the enemy army and the liberation of conquered lands."

Syrian troops in Lebanon pulled out from their nearest positions to the Israeli border on Saturday, continuing a movement apparently designed to minimize the threat of Israeli attacks. A Reuters correspondent said Syrian soldiers pulled out from their position on the al-Awali River at the entrance of the port city of Sidon, 40 kilometres west of Shaba Farms.

Attacks on rabbis shock German Jews

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — German Jewish leaders have been shaken by an attack on two visiting American rabbis and the vandalizinig of a Holocaust memorial here.

The incidents came after a string of violent attacks on synagogues and other Jewish venues in Belgium and France.

The Berlin attack, which occurred March 31, came after German officials said they would increase security at Jewish sites following the Belgian and French attacks, and following pressure from German Jewish leaders. But no steps to increase security have been taken yet.

To extend Middle East violence "to include all Jews shows the true, grotesque face of fanatical Islamists, who ultimately want to dump Israel in the sea and see Judaism as public enemy No. 1," said Michel Friedman, vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

There has been an increase in anti-Semitic attacks here during the past year -and-a-half, but nothing comparable to the surge that has shocked the Jewish community of France.

The latest incident may have been a wake-up call. Berlin Inforadio reported last week that two young Orthodox rabbis visiting from the United States were attacked recently by a group of young men on the city's main shopping street.

One of the men was beaten and kicked so badly he had to be brought in an ambulance to the hospital, where he was treated for injuries to his face.

Berlin police reported that the rabbis had come out of a synagogue and were on their way to the home of Chabad Lubavitch Rabbi Yehudah Teichtal when they were accosted by six to eight men who appeared to be Arabs.

One asked the Americans, "Are you a Jew?" When the young man confirmed this, the attackers allegedly beat and kicked him to the ground.

State police said they have no trace of the attackers. They are looking for witnesses and have published a hotline number for information on the case.

"We were all shocked," Rabbi Teichtal told reporters last week. "Our guests were in Berlin for the first time. It is regrettable that they have to leave the city with such a negative impression."

Berlin's Jewish community of about 12,000 is the largest in Germany, with seven synagogues and several schools and Jewish cemeteries.

Security for Jewish venues there, already greatly increased after the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, has not been further strengthened, according to a Berlin police spokesperson.

Police with machine guns are already posted outside most Jewish venues, and some locations have double police barriers.

The Berlin community and the Central Council responded with shock that such an attack could take place in Germany's capital.

Alexander Brenner, head of the Berlin community, said unfair media reports on Israel were partly to blame for the anti-Semitic attacks.

The community's vice president, Moishe Waks, said the community is planning a demonstration of solidarity with Israel.

Friedman said the radicalization is "easy to see" in Germany. Jews used to have to protect themselves from right-wing extremists, he said, but now they also have to guard against "Islamic criminals."

The day before the rabbis were attacked, a Jewish Holocaust memorial in Berlin was vandalized. Police reported that their patrols found swastikas painted on the memorial shortly after midnight. The perpetrators have not yet been found.

Thousands march in France to support Israel

Pro-Palestinian marches, which also took place in Belgium, Germany, Greece, Italy and Switzerland over the weekend, have been almost weekly occurrences in Paris for months.

The French Jewish community, however, has not staged a large rally since the early 1990s, after the desecration of a Jewish cemetery in Carpentras in southeast France.

The recent anti-Jewish attacks prompted Prime Minister Lionel Jospin to put police guards at Jewish sites.

On Saturday, arsonists threw petrol-filled bottles into a Jewish sports club in the southern city of Toulouse, a day after a homemade unexploded bomb was found in a Jewish cemetery in Strasbourg, which had already been a target of arsonists earlier in the week.

Attacks on synagogues have also occurred in recent weeks in Montpellier, Marseille and Paris.

In Marseille, a synagogue was firebombed over Passover despite the presence of two police guards posted there as part of the government's effort to stem the recent wave of violence.

No one was injured and the synagogue was not damaged. The two assailants got away.

The incident occurred while hundreds of families took part in an evening Passover ceremony across town beside the charred remains of the Or Aviv synagogue, which burned down after a nighttime attack earlier in the week.

The congregation erected a tent in the parking lot for prayers to mark the end of Passover and vowed to rebuild their synagogue.

"A blow was delivered against us, but it is not a mortal blow," said congregant Claude Guedj, 40.

In another incident over Passover, arsonists burned a pavilion in a Jewish cemetery in the eastern French town of Schiltigheim, causing the pavilion's roof to collapse and destroying most of its walls, police said. A flammable liquid was also thrown at the town's synagogue, with no damage reported.

As well, last week attackers threw several firebombs at the Jewish religious centre in the southern city of Montpellier, setting a nearby office on fire, and a bus was torched at a Jewish school in the Paris suburb of Aubervilliers. No one was hurt in either attack.

Last week, French President Jacques Chirac condemned the acts of violence against Jewish institutions.

Chirac told the head of the Jewish student association, Patrick Klugman, that "when one synagogue is burned, all of France is humiliated, and when one Jew is harmed, all of France is harmed."

Jospin, who is running for president against the conservative Chirac in upcoming elections in which crime has become a key issue, warned Sunday about letting the Middle East conflict play itself out inside France.

"If we want to talk about peace in the Middle East, we have to show first that we are capable of living peacefully together at home," Jospin told fellow Socialists at a rally in Paris. "We cannot accept that horrible passions and antagonism are imported to France."

Also Sunday, thousands of demonstrators in New York City filled a city block near the United Nations building to show support for Israel.

Police enforced extra-tight security that included removing backpacks and checking inside coats as demonstrators were admitted past metal barriers to the rally scene on East 47th Street.

"This is to show support to Israel and to demonstrate against worldwide terrorism," said Lenny Brafman, 46, who was holding one end of a banner made of U.S. and Israeli flags pinned together.

One sign read: "Arafat=Osama= Terror," equating Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat with Osama bin Laden, the fugitive leader of the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

The rally came a day after hundreds of people marched across the Brooklyn Bridge to city hall in lower Manhattan to demonstrate against Israeli actions in the West Bank and Gaza. Protesters carried signs and yelled chants that compared Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to Adolf Hitler.

The pro-Israel rally was organized by Rabbi Avi Weiss and the Coalition for Jewish Concerns, which holds frequent pro-Israel rallies, but rarely attracts so many people.

The Week in Israel

April 1

• Three Israelis were injured, one seriously, in a bombing in downtown Jerusalem. Police chief Mickey Levy said police at a roadblock asked a driver for his identification card when the car exploded. Levy said it was unclear if the blast had been caused by a suicide bomber or if the vehicle itself had been booby-trapped.

April 2

• Israel and Ukraine signed a deal in Kiev that lets them share missile, launcher and navigation technology.

• A car bomb at a roadblock north of Jerusalem killed an Israeli police officer, while one IDF soldier died and 15 were injured by gunfire in the territories. Two were in serious condition.

• Four more people injured in the Netanya seder suicide bombing died of their wounds, bringing the total dead to 25.

April 3

• Egypt suspended all contacts with the government of Israel, but it is keeping open diplomatic channels that could help the Palestinians, Egyptian Information Minister Safwat al-Sherif said.

April 4

• Hezbollah guerrillas, using rifle butts and sticks, beat up four United Nations observers in southern Lebanon, injuring one seriously, the head of the UN military force in Lebanon said.

April 5

• Hezbollah fired anti-tank rockets at IDF outposts along the border with Lebanon, near Har Dov and on Mt. Hermon. This was the first time IDF positions on Mt. Hermon have come under Hezbollah fire. IDF artillery returned fire. (An IDF soldier was lightly wounded from rocket fire at Har Dov earlier in the week..)

Saudi Arabia in the spotlight

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Saudi Arabia's recently-presented peace plan, in addition to last September's terrorist attacks in the United States, has focused laser-sharp attention on Saudi Arabia, one of Washington's oldest Arab allies.

Mideast Analysis

Fifteen out of 19 hijackers who crashed commercial airlines into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. were Saudi nationals. Furthermore, Saudi charities have channelled funds to Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network, while Saudi-funded seminaries in Pakistan and Afghanistan steered students into the arms of Al Qaeda.

Although Crown Prince Abdullah, Saudi Arabia's de facto ruler in place of ailing King Fahd, recently issued a warning to senior clerics not to dabble in or promote extremism, Riyadh has offered only tepid support for the United States' war against global terrorism.

Despite American pressure, Saudi Arabia – whose peace initiative offers Israel normal relations with the Arab world in exchange for a full withdrawal from the territories and a "just resolution" of the Palestinian refugee problem – has yet to announce measures to freeze the accounts of suspected terrorists. However, Saudi Arabia has stated it will not allow its charities to be exploited for non-charitable purposes.

In retrospect, the Sept. 11 catastrophe has had the unintended effect of shedding light on Saudi Arabia's conservative, autocratic, secretive, theocratic society.

Since few westerners, or non-Muslims, for that matter, are granted visitors's visas, Saudi Arabia has managed to insulate itself from external influences.

Many Saudis, some cosmopolitan, believe that Sept. 11 was conceived by the Mossad, Israel's secret service. Anti-Israel feelings run high in Saudi Arabia, which opposes Israel's current military campaign in the West Bank.

The world's biggest oil producer, Saudi Arabia is ruled like a fiefdom by two dominant forces, the House of Saud – an absolute monarchy – and the Wahhabi religious establishment.

The 5,000 princes and their relatives who compose the House of Saud are basically in charge of political and economic matters. The Wahhabi clerics attend to social and religious policies. They also ensure that the austere, xenophobic form of Islam known as Wahhabism – a kind of Islamic fundamentalism not so different than that championed by the Taliban– is preserved.

Under the strictures of Wahhabism, Islam is the only official religion, and all citizens must be Muslims. Non-Muslims who engage in overt religious activities are subject to arrest and deportation. Freedom of religion, as it is universally understood, is simply non-existent.

Western-style democracy, with its notions of free and unfettered expression, remains a mirage. Saudi Arabia's constitution is a mélange of the Koran and the teachings of the Prophet.

Saudi schools lay an inordinate emphasis on religious instruction and relatively little on mathematics and science. The government has talked about reforming Saudi schools, but nothing has come of the plans. In effect, the Saudi education system has produced a cadre of Islamic revolutionaries who may yet threaten the country's stability.

Oil revenues peaked in 1981 at $227 billion (US), but have fallen drastically since then. As a result, per-annum per-capita income has dropped by more than half, to about $7,000. This has forced the government to cut back social welfare payments – this at a time when poverty and discrepancies of wealth are increasing and unemployment is dangerously rampant among young people.

It is a breeding ground for Islamic radicalism, which has no special affection for the House of Saud. In general, the ruling class is widely regarded as self-serving and corrupt.

Saudi Arabia has a symbiotic, albeit touchy, relationship with the United States. The Americans – and their allies – require Saudi oil and depend on Saudi arms purchases running into the billions of dollars. The Saudis, in turn, need U.S. protection, as the 1991 Gulf War vividly illustrated.

Baycrest program offers seniors in-home services

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Baycrest Home Care offers seniors such services as nursing, personal care, respite care, homemaking, cleaning or escorts.

Manager Terri Noy said that while there is a charge, the revenue goes to help fund various programs at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The services are available seven days a week, she said, and can be tailored to provide as much or as little help as is necessary.

The program is not just for Jews, or those living at home, she said. It is also for those who need temporary assistance while waiting for placement in a long-term care facility, or those already in a facility, including Baycrest Terrace or the Apotex Home for the Aged.

The services are particularly needed since the provincial and municipal governments have reduced their funding, Noy said.

For instance, she said, in long-term care facilities, funding is only available to provide one bath a week. Someone might hire a caregiver to allow a person to bathe more often.

At Baycrest Terrace, she said, a caregiver may be hired per task. She could give three baths in one hour, or help several residents dress or prepare meals.

Because staff is bonded and trained, people can feel safe inviting them into their homes for personal care or for housecleaning.

Service can be instituted within three hours, if necessary, Noy said. If a person is in the hospital emergency room, someone can either go to stay with them there, meet them wherever they are going, or escort them home.

Dan Gilbert, a resident of Baycrest Terrace, receives foot care from Norma Rivera of Baycrest Home Care Services.

Someone might be hired, she suggested, to take seniors to and from medical appointments; or help them pack for a trip, take them to the airport, and then meet them on their return and help unpack.

Noy noted that Baycrest Home Care Services has both male and female staff. This is particularly important for their Orthodox clients, who might feel uncomfortable with being cared for by someone of the opposite sex, she said.

An innovative approach has Noy contacting bridal consultants and wedding and party planners. If parents (or relatives) are coming from out of town, someone can meet them and take them to their hotel.

Even if parents live in the city, she suggested, someone could be hired to help clients dress, prepare them to have photographs taken, take them to the affair, take them home early if necessary, and settle them down afterwards.

"Think how much more relaxed the hostess will be, knowing that she doesn't have to worry. You have to recognize that this service will let people come to a simchah who otherwise might not be able to."

Noy said that all travel must be in taxies, as there is no insurance to permit the staff to drive.

The program is provided in co-operation with Spectrum Health Care who supplies the staff, and those involved are oriented to respect the cultural issues and needs of the clients, she said.

If the situation is not an emergency, Noy said, a nurse determines exactly what is needed and how many hours of care will fulfill those needs. She will then create a care plan. There is no charge for the assessment.

For more information, call Baycrest Home Care Services 416-964-6402, or through the Baycrest Web site, www.baycrest.org, and click on programs and services.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

I have recently received many inquiries regarding organic foods. I have begun to address them before and will continue to discuss them in this and some upcoming columns.

Q. I have noticed a growing number of organic products in conventional grocery stores. What is your opinion on organics?

A. I have become a very big believer in organic products, some in particular. Raisins and peanuts are known to be "the most pesticide saturated foods" (The Organic Gourmet, edited by Tracy Kett). These are definitely two foods that I would always look to buy organic. Incidentally organic raisins, while slightly more expensive are significantly more plump and delicious. Some other foods that I personally feel strongly about are strawberries (because of their very high absorption of pesticides), milk, lettuces, grapes and apples.

Q. What does organic mean?

A. Organic foods are foods that have basically not been in contact with synthetic fertilizers, pesticides, herbicides, artificial preservatives or additives.

Q. Does it make sense to only buy some organic foods, or should I buy completely organic?

A. It definitely makes sense. Buy what you have access to and what is affordable and important. Foods that you consume a lot of are probably a good place to start. It is hard to find everything organic without running all over town to many stores, so if you are interested in adding more organic foods to your diet, find a store near you (there are many – most health food stores carry fresh organic produce, as do many supermarkets), and start trying out some things. As summer approaches, there will be an even better selection. Let me know how it goes.

Q. How do you know that a food is really organic?

A. Fortunately we now have standards in place in Canada to govern and certify organic foods. Organic foods will be marked that they are certified organic.

Q. Are organic foods safe for kids?

A. I believe so, and I feed a lot of organic food to my young children, particularly raisins, milk and produce. I think that a regular piece of fruit or a berry coated with pesticides, etc. is only magnified in concentration in a little body. Remember that even though a produce item is organic, it must be well washed.

Playwright says Adam Baum is 'good for the Jews'

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Asked if his play, Adam Baum and the Jew Movie, is good or bad for the Jews, Daniel Goldfarb hesitates for a moment.

"I think it asks some tough questions, but overall I think it is good for the Jews."

Goldfarb said the play, which runs at Canadian Stage to May 4, started out in 1993 as a 10-minute sketch. It's based on a real conversation between movie producer Samuel Goldwyn and screenwriter Ring Lardner, Jr. about Soil in Utopia, a film Goldwyn planned to make on how Jews liked the new world.

"My main character [movie mogul Samuel Baum] is a lot like Goldwyn, but he is out of my own imagination," Goldfarb says. "But there is something of Louis B. Mayer, another Hollywood producer at the time, in him. When the play is over, the audience will realize that the movie mogul and the writer are both incomplete, that they have something to learn about each other, that they are not dissimilar in a moral sense."

The playwright adds: "I think Jewish people will realize that they too have prejudices."

The 28-year-old Goldfarb, who was born and raised in Toronto, is excited that his three-character play is being produced in his hometown after a well-received run in New York at the off-Broadway Blue Light Theater with Ron Libman heading the cast.

In the Canadian Stage production, well-known actor Richard Greenblatt plays Baum, father of Adam (played by Dylan Rosenthal). In the play, the screenwriter (played by Rick Richards) attends Adam's bar mitzvah to get to know his subject.

For Goldfarb, who attended Claude Watson School for the Arts at Earl Haig Secondary School in North York before going on to New York University, Adam Baum and the Jew Movie is a dream come true.

"It's my first professionally produced play, even though I've been writing ever since I was in high school," he says. "My ambition is to become a first-rank playwright. In the meantime, I'm looking into writing for the screen and TV."

He considers himself fortunate that a lot of good actors took part in staged readings of his first play, Oedipus Jew, which was written while he was at NYU but was never staged professionally.

Goldfarb is hoping a theatre in New York will pick up his play, Modern Orthodox, which was put on by the Long Wharf Theater in Connecticut for five weeks last summer. He has also finished writing another play.

Goldfarb stressed that Adam Baum and the Jew Movie is based on a real event, though the play is fiction. "I didn't even realize that I should name the play so it sounded like the 'atom bomb' until I was well into it, and then everything clicked."

Goldfarb is the son of Martin and Joan Goldfarb (his father is founder and head of the market research and polling firm Golfarb Consultants). He has three sisters and a brother.

For tickets to Adam Baum and the Jew Movie, call 416 386-3110.

Timeless themes in Miller classic

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When a theatre production transports you to a terrifying period like the Nazi era, the entertainment can become a history and a therapy session. This is the case with Incident at Vichy, where issues of personal blame, sacrifice and anti-Semitism, set against the backdrop of World War II France, are highlighted by riveting dialogue.

The Arthur Miller play was recently performed by Stage Centre Productions at the Fairview Library Theatre.

Quickly, the lights black out in preparation for the opening scene. When the lights splash on, eight nervous men sit outside a detention centre in Vichy France, in September 1942. They have been mysteriously rounded up by French officers to see a police captain and German professor.

Confusion turns to desperation, strangers become enemies and anti-Semitism darkens the mainly Jewish group. The imminent interrogation upsets all eight men, from the intelligent Austrian nobleman down to the penniless 14-year-old.

The actors portray their anxiety with enough balance to steer clear of extremes. Each man may think aloud to his neighbour and find comfort in nuggets of advice exchanged, but suspicion still taints the unity.

The painter Lebeau (Will van der Zyl) asks, "What kind of crew is this?" The answers trickle out, as each man reveals the mental turbulence of living under the Vichy regime. Whether their response is political, religious or practical, the insights we get into all the characters' concerns reveal their major misgivings.

Miller breathes historical life into the Incident at Vichy by infusing his characters with determined conviction against Nazi brutality. The Austrian prince Von Berg (Roger Kell) shakes his fist in anger when he berates German vulgarity, and he delivers intelligent monologues on the cultural shame of German tyranny. The waiter (Scott Griffin) and the boy (Scott Newlands) deliver believable performances of despondent Jewish prisoners who handle their fate with quiet sorrow.

As each man is summoned into the questioning room, the tension mounts: Why are German personnel in the neutral zone of France? Are they truly just checking for forged papers?

The audience can sense the helplessness of the detainees, and the well-crafted dialogue highlights the pain each is suffering inside. The issues of personal blame and responsibility to one's fellow man of whatever religion become integral concepts that arise repeatedly.

And the idea of anti-Semitism within Judaism introduces a theme largely unexplored in mainstream theatre.

Under the direction of L. Garth Allen, who is also the artistic director of Stage Centre, the confused men accuse each other of treachery and cowardice. Even when an escape is shakily planned, the parties that don't get involved are insulted for their moral weakness.

The lighting, sparse set and mournful accordion music add their own flavour to this compelling Miller classic. Because of the timeless themes, the play should be revisited periodically to remind each new generation of what Jews went through in the 1940s, physically, morally and psychologically.

Stage Centre is an amateur theatre group that has staged over 130 different productions in its 25 years. The full repertory company's goal is to entertain audiences with theatre classics.

Visit a living and breathing museum in Prague

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

The "City of the Hundred Spires," the "Golden City" and the "Paris of the East" are just some of the names bestowed on Prague, the capital of the Czech Republic.

Although I came prepared to be blasé from having heard too much praise, the beauty and grace of Prague took me by surprise. Miraculously escaping destruction in World War II, each of its neighbourhoods contains an invaluable trove of Romanesque, Gothic, Baroque, Renaissance and Art Nouveau architecture.

The tombstone of Rabbi Low who is associated with the legend of the Golem. [Robert Shechter photo]

All of Prague is a living and breathing museum, but some must-see landmarks can be singled out: the 14th century Charles Bridge (Karlovy Most) with its 30 statues which – according to legend – talk to each other after the tourists are gone; the imposing castle that dominates the city; the Old Town Square that has witnessed happy and tragic events throughout the city's long history, and comes alive with musicians, vendors, cafés and a small army of people carrying signs advertising the city's many musical events. Prague continues the strong cultural and artistic legacy of Wolfgang Mozart – who was a frequent and much loved visitor – Anton Dvorak, Bedřich Smetana, Leoš Janáček, as well as Jaroslav Hasek and Franz Kafka, just to name a few.

Visitors to Prague face an embarrassment of cultural riches, all at very reasonable prices: opera in three splendid opera houses, concerts in practically all of the city's churches and concert halls, and the national Czech treasures of the Marionette Theatre, the Black Light Theatre and the Lanterna Magika.

Each of the city's neighbourhoods has its own attractions, but probably the Old Town – Stare Mesto – is the one where most visitors converge first, with the 15th-century Astronomical Clock Tower with its hourly procession of postles as a favourite meeting place.

Adjacent to the Old Town Square, the Josefov neighbourhood – the original Jewish Town – has changed beyond recognition during an urban renewal that, at the beginning of the 20th century, replaced the maze of streets, passageways, lanes and small houses with magnificent Neo-Renaissance, Neo-Baroque and Art Nouveau edifices along Parizska, Maiselova and Siroka streets.

Luckily, a number of the original synagogues have been preserved, some still functioning as places of prayer, and all of them together designated as the "Jewish Museum in Prague," a unique monument dedicated to the 1,000-year history of the city's Jewish community.

The first Jewish settlement in Prague appeared around the 10th century. In order to distinguish themselves from their Christian neighbours, the Jews were constrained in a closed community, later designated as the "ghetto," and had to wear pointed hats and a yellow badge.

Peaceful periods alternated with pogroms and persecutions, culminating with expulsion by empress Maria Theresa in the 18th century. Eventually, the situation improved somewhat, and the emperor Joseph II opened the gates of the Jewish quarter and accorded it administrative status; in gratitude, the Jews named their town Josefov.

During World War II, 80,000 Jews from Bohemia and Moravia were killed by the Nazis. The names of the Holocaust victims are remembered in one of the most touching memorials I have ever seen.

It is perhaps symbolic that this memorial is housed in the Pinkas Synagogue, which is adjacent to the Old Jewish Cemetery. Thus the turbulent history of medieval Jewry weaves its continuity into the terrible history of 20th-century Jewry: a cemetery of tombstones next to a cemetery of people with no graves.

At the entrance to the Pinkas Synagogue, a plaque reads: "The names of the Czech and Moravian Jews, victims of Nazi genocide between 1939 and 1945, are inscribed on the walls of Pinkas Synagogue… the synagogue where for centuries Prague Jews came to worship is now a memorial to some 80,000 innocent men, women and children who have no grave and would otherwise remain forgotten."

As I moved from room to room, I thought that the synagogue should also have a private crying place for visitors. All the walls are covered from floor to ceiling with names and dates of birth and death. The birth dates are all different, the death dates dreadfully similar. It is a wallpaper of death and destruction.

The cemetery next door dates from the 15th century; burials took place here until 1787. Because space was limited, the cemetery contains 12 levels superimposed on top of each other; as earth was brought in to add new layers, the older stones were lifted and placed alongside the newer ones.

There are about 12,000 tombstones in total, creating an unusual and eerie setting, a maze of stones of all shapes at crazy angles, practically on top of each other, with tall old trees punctuating their apparent disarray.

The most famous tombstone is that of Rabbi Liwa ben Bezalel, known as Rabbi Low, the creator of the mythical Golem who, according to legend, was put to rest in the attic of the Old-New Synagogue (Staronova Synagogue).

Built in early Gothic style in the 13th century from broken stones of the Jerusalem Temple – or so another legend goes – the Old-New Synagogue is one of three Prague synagogues, together with the High and the Jerusalem synagogues, that still hold services today.

Facing the Old-New Synagogue is an interesting sight. Two clocks grace the building of the Renaissance-style Jewish Town Hall, the seat of the Jewish Council since 1577: the top one is a traditional clock, while the bottom one revolves counter-clockwise over Hebrew letters used as numbers.

A few more synagogues, all within walking distance of each other, contain the exhibits of the "Jewish Museum in Prague." Visitors get the benefit of viewing the invaluable historical displays as well as each structure's architectural beauty.

Today, not many Jews live in the Jewish Town. But when the bustle of the tourists, cafés, shops and souvenir stands dies down, when darkness descends and the street lamps light up mysterious corners, the old legends come alive, the Golem walks the dark alleys and the past blends into the present.

The sound of music on the mighty Mississipi

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

NEW ORLEANS — In the history of jazz, it was the city of New Orleans and the "Old Man River," the Mississippi, that witnessed the birth and growth of a musical expression.

Through the years, people of all races have lived together in the melting pot of New Orleans, a centre controlled at various times by the Spanish and the French, which later saw Irish, British and German immigrants and fortune seekers stream into the city.

The ragtime played by Scott Joplin and the country blues sung on the banks of the Mississippi lay at the roots of jazz as African rhythms, European instrumentation and elements of European harmonics fused into an American musical form that has captured the world.

Even before World War I, New Orleans-style jazz blasted from the city's taverns. Coronet, trombone and clarinet carried the melodic parts, while tuba or bass, drums and banjo, and sometimes the piano, created the feverish two-beat rhythm. Kid Ory, who played trombone, founded a band in 1911 and enlisted people such as Louis Armstrong and King Oliver, and the group became the most-noted exponent of two-beat jazz.

It's little wonder that the Mississippi was the conduit of this new craze, as paddlewheelers, their bands on board, took the music northward. Jazz classics such as the Basin Street Blues, St. Louis Blues, Beal Street Blues, Memphis Blues and Kansas City Shuffle got their names from places where the steamers moored, including New Orleans.

The city's beating heart is the Vieux Carré, the French Quarter. Bordered by Canal Street, North Rampart Street, the Esplanade and the riverfront, it is alive with music, impromptu gatherings, street parades and the occasional funeral procession.

In the French Quarter, there are still places where jazz is being played as it was during the early years of the 20th century. Passed on from generation to generation, today's musicians have learned from some of the greats: Armstrong, Buddy Bolden, King Oliver, Kid Ory, Armstrong and Sidney Bechet.

The French Quarter is alive with music, impromtu gatherings and street parades.

One landmark is Preservation Hall at 726 St. Peter St. Always crowded, this rundown shell of a venue is a must for the serious jazz fan. Oldtimers congregate there, playing traditional New Orleans-style jazz, while the audience, sitting close to the tiny stage, is in intimate contact with the musicians.

Another landmark, Miss LuLu White's Mahagony Hall at 309 Bourbon St., was once the most famous jazz spot in town. In the 1950s it was turned into a warehouse, then went through a brief revival in the '80s and '90s, but today it is no more.

During the French Quarter Festival in April, followed by the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, the whole Vieux Carré explodes to the beat of jazz. Jackson Square near the river turns into a huge outdoor party, as bands and solo players blow their stuff under the southern sun.

While the crowds mingle, a Mississippi paddlewheeler glides by. Perhaps it is the Natchez, a typical small-size steamer on its way upriver, or one of the other boats, such as the Cajun Queen or the more authentic-looking Creole Queen.

Among the stern wheelers departing from New Orleans is the oldest and proudest, the Delta Queen. Built in 1926, it has an illustrious history. Its steel hulls were made at the Isherwood Shipyards in Glasgow, Scotland, while its wheel shafts and cranks came from the Krupp works in Essen, Germany. The superstructure was manufactured in America from oak, teak, mahagony and Oregon cedar.

The Delta Queen first saw service as a river steamer on the Sacramento in California, then was taken over by the U.S. Navy during World War II and used to ferry sailors to their ships in San Francisco Bay. After the war, the ship was bought by its present owner, the Delta Queen Steamship Company. It was towed down the Pacific coast, through the Panama Canal to New Orleans, and continued under its own steam to be refitted in Pittsburgh, Pa.

Today the Delta Queen is again a floating palace. Designated as a national historic landmark, it's the only authentic, fully restored steamboat in the United States. Its interior recalls the legendary time when "steamboatin" was a part of life along the grand old river. Rich hardwood panelling, gleaming brass, a Tiffany crystal chandelier above the grand staircase and stained-glass windows create an atmosphere and warmth rarely found anywhere on a Mississippi steamer.

But there is another "Queen" in the fleet of the Delta Queen Steamship Company: the stately Mississippi Queen. Mark Twain once said that "somebody... someday... will build the biggest [Mississippi] steamboat the world has ever known... and that one shall be the Queen of the Mississippi!"

Built in 1976, the Mississippi Queen, at 116 metres long, 21 metres wide, is the largest Mississippi stern wheeler ever built. With a giant paddle that weighs 70 tons, seven decks, a gym, a sauna, a cinema, elevators and room-to-room telephones, it is truly an extraordinary ship.

Naturally, it moves at a snail's pace, as it churns along at 12 km/h past the plantations with their grand houses and formal gardens, and the old South comes alive.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

ISRAEL MUSEUM COLLECTION OF DADA AND SURREALIST ART COMING TO TORONTO

The Schwarz Collection of Dada and Surrealist Art is coming from Israel to Toronto for an exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) that opens June 14.

The Israel Museum received the Arturo Schwarz Collection as a gift in 1998. It includes more than 700 works of art assembled by Arturo Schwarz, a poet, art historian, scholar, art collector and dealer. The museum has arranged some 200 pieces as a travelling exhibition, representing the work of such artists as Marcel Duchamp, Man Ray and Max Ernst.

The exhibition, Dreaming With Open Eyes, includes the full range of media: painting, sculpture, objects, drawing, prints, collages, photographs, artist's books and other publications and ephemera. It is sponsored by Aecon and runs to Sept. 8.

As a companion exhibit, the AGO is presenting a display of prints and illustrated books of surrealist Andre Masson (1896-1987). The Masson exhibition is drawn from gifts of works from Sondra and Allan Gotlieb, and also runs June 14 to Sept. 8.

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band

Flying Bulgars in Concert: The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, those well-known purveyors of neo-Yiddish music and song, bring their unique and passionate sound to their first Toronto concert appearance in more than a year.

Joining them is special guest Jane Bunnett, an award-winning musician acclaimed for her contributions to Afro-Cuban music and jazz. According to a press release, the concert will feature "new compositions that explore the places where the music of Jews, Gypsies and Cubans intersects."

Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W. Adults $20. Saturday, May 25, 8 p.m.

Foundation Supports Jewish Studies: Steven Spielberg's Righteous Persons Foundation has awarded Brandeis University $500,000 (US) in support of Genesis, a summer program for high school students that integrates Jewish studies, the arts, humanities and social action.

The Boston-area school met the foundation's three-to-one challenge, raising $1.5 million before the foundation made its contribution. The Genesis program, which began in 1997, is renowned for educating and training "the next generation of Jewish leaders," said Brandeis president Jehuda Reinharz. It serves 75 students each year.

Fines, shmines; Cuban shakes off $500,000 penalty

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban, life has never been better. The fact that his basketball club was off to its best-ever start and sat in first place in the NBA's Midwest Division had nothing to do with it.

The dot-com billionaire, who bought the team and a half-interest in their new arena from Ross Perot Jr. for $280 million (US) two years ago, said work these days is all about doing the best he can for his customers and employees. If he does that well, everyone benefits personally and financially and has a lot of fun in the process.

Cuban tried to take that message to the NBA brass when he recently spent a day working at a Dairy Queen outlet in Texas following his latest criticism of the league.

Cuban was given a league-record $500,000 (US) fine on Jan. 8 for saying he wouldn't hire Ed Rush (head of officiating) to manage a Dairy Queen. It was the latest in a string of incidents between him and the NBA.

Last season, he was fined seven times for a total of $505,000 (US) for criticizing the officiating, making a derogatory gesture, running onto the court to break up a fight and sitting on the edge of the court instead of in a chair. He matches all his fines with a donation to charity.

"I don't have a problem with the refs," said Cuban via e-mail, citing the fines as a cost of doing business. "I have a problem with their manager and the way the league is run. I think the league should be run as a for profit organization that is always trying to improve every part of its business, rather than as a kingdom."

In an attempt to deal with what he says is a lack of consistency among the league's officials, Cuban hired a statistics expert in December to track their calls in all NBA games. He believes the evaluation of every official will reveal tendencies that can be used to his team's advantage. Cuban's initial findings indicate there has been almost a nine per cent drop in the number of fouls called.

Mark Cuban

Born in Squirrel Hill in Pittsburgh, Cuban grew up in what he calls "about as Jewish a neighbourhood as you could find," and remained involved in the Jewish community after going away to college. He said Judaism plays a calming influence that underpins who he is.

"I have a special connection to those who have lived and died to allow me to become who I am today," said Cuban.

"I have the opportunity and the obligation to pass that on to my family and those close to me. Our place in the world is defined by who we are, no matter where we are."

Cuban, who acquired his wealth through MicroSolutions without even knowing how to use a computer, stressed he is saying and doing the same things he's done in every other business venture, but is getting attention now because the media puts sports under a microscope.

"When I was saying what was on my mind, and working on the same principles in the Internet or technology industries, no one wrote about it," he said.

"There is no good reason to change my approach just because it is now being written about. It's worked well for me in the past, no reason to change now."

After graduating from Indiana University with a business degree, Cuban founded MicroSolutions and developed it into one of the leading systems integration firms in the United States. Just seven years later, he sold the company to CompuServe for $5 million (US).

He later dreamed of being able to listen to every Indiana Hoosiers basketball game while in Dallas, where he moved after finishing college in 1982. From that idea, Cuban co-founded Broadcast.com, the leading provider of multimedia and streaming on the Internet, which was later sold to Yahoo! at a profit of more than $1 billion (US).

After selling MicroSolutions, he split the proceeds with his employees. And when he sold Broadcast.com, all 300 of his employees became stock option millionaires. Cuban is now investing in HDNet, the world's only national television network broadcasting all high-definition content.

His piles of money not only bought him the Mavs, but two years ago he purchased a 14-seat Gulfstream V jet – at $41 million (US), it was the largest single online purchase made to date. He lives in a 10-bedroom, 10-bathroom, 24,000-square-foot, $15 million (US) mansion in Dallas.

Cuban says he had no inkling at the outset that his business ventures would turn out to make him one of the richest men in America today.

"I was just as afraid as any entrepreneur starting their business," recalls Cuban. "I remember celebrating every month MicroSolutions was in business with a sigh of relief. It was like, 'Wow, made it through month three,' 'Wow, made it through month 14.'

"I never take anything for granted. I always work from the premise that there is some 13-year-old kid that just got their bar or bat mitzvah money that has a great idea and is going to put me out of business."

Lithuanian appeal against Israeli skating medal rejected

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NAGANO, Japan — Just when the International Skating Union (ISU) thought the coast was clear, another judging controversy came along to cast an ugly shadow over the world figure skating championships in Nagano.

Never mind that Russian Alexei Yagudin skated brilliantly to add a fourth world title to his Olympic gold medal, and compatriot Irina Slutskaya won her first world championship gold after so many years as bridesmaid.

Already struggling to salvage the reputation of the sport after a judging scandal that dominated the first week of the Salt Lake City Olympics, the ISU has been hit by fresh allegations of "pre-determined" results in ice-dance.

As the world championships closed with an exhibition watched by the Japanese Crown Prince Naruhito and Princess Masako, the ISU rejected a Lithuanian protest against the result of the ice dancing competition.

The Lithuanian delegation protested against the decision to award the bronze medal to Israeli couple Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovski ahead of Margarita Drobiazko and Povilas Vanagas. It was Israel's first medal ever at a world championship.

Five of the nine judges had voted for the Israelis over the Lithuanians in the free program, prompting Vanagas to accuse Israel of "buying" the bronze medal and some members of the ISU of mafioso-type behaviour.

Chait called Vanagas and Dobriazko "sore losers" as the mud-slinging continued, overshadowing the achievement of Irina Lobacheva and Ilia Averbukh, who won their first world title, and silver medalists Shae-Lynn Bourne and Victor Kraatz of Canada.

More than 30 skaters and coaches from the ice dancing competition – including American champions Naomi Lang and Peter Tchernyshev and French coach Muriel Zazoui – signed a petition in favour of Lithuania's protest.

In another twist, a German reporter told Reuters that an Israeli skating official had told him in a phone call before the world championships that they would finish on the medals podium.

Judging in figure skating has been controversial for years, with reports that order of finish is predetermined by the judges.

At the Salt Lake City Olympics, Russians Elena Berezhnaya and Anton Sikharulidze "won" the gold despite an obvious slip by Sikharulidze and a clean skate from Jamie Sale and David Pelletier of Canada.

Afterward a French judge claimed she had been "bullied" into voting for the Russians, and after a furious row that badly damaged the reputation of the sport, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) awarded the Canadians a duplicate gold medal.

The judge in question, Marie-Reine Le Gougne, has since been suspended by the ISU. In a press conference in Nagano just hours before the ill-fated ice dancing free program, ISU's president warned judges to "respect the rules."

ספרותנו

יעל זליגר

לכבוד יום העצמאות

הימים כל-כך קשים. התחושה היא של חוסר-אונים, של פחד ואי-וודאות. על מה אכתוב לקראת גליון יום העצמאות? על תפילתי לשלום? מחאה של שמאל או ימין? דתי או לא דתי? ממש לא. הרהרתי וחשבתי ואז ידעתי שאני רוצה לבחור בספר שנכתב לילדים וכן משהו שיעורר גאווה וגם חיוך ושנשמח קצת. וכך בחרתי בספר: סבא עולה לכיתה א' מאת: חנה זהר, הוצאת הקיבוץ המאוחד.

זהו ספרה הראשון של זהר ונקווה שלא האחרון. (איורים מקסימים של שירה שכטר). הספר מספר על משפחתו של אלכס שהגיעה מרוסיה. "סבא סרגי וסבתא מרוסיה, אבא הוא מישקה ואמא אירינה ותינוק נחמדת ששמה הוא מרינה." הכל הם עושים ברוסית; מדברים, צוחקים, קוראים, כותבים ומתווכחים. כדרכם של ילדים, אלכס שסיים את הגן למד את השפה העברית בקלות. הוא לא רק מדבר ושר בעברית אלא כבר חושב בעברית. אמא ואבא מאוד מופתעים, יוצא מן הכלל, ממש מצוין, הילד לא צריך שום אולפן! רק סבא סרגי מחייך ושותק. לבסוף, סבא מתוודה בפני סבתא שגם הוא רוצה ללכת לבית ספרו של אלכס ללמוד עברית. סבתא צוחקת ומזכירה לסרגי שהוא כבר מזמן לא היה בן שש, אך סבא בשלו. בבוקר, השכם, סבא כבר ער, הילקוט החדש תלוי על גבו, בידו תיק אוכל ועם מבט שובבי בעיניו, צועד סבא עם נכדו לבית הספר.

סיפור פשוט, כתוב ללא יומרנות ומדבר אל לב כולנו. ההקבלה בין שלב המעבר עבור הילד בן חשש שעולה לכיתה א' ולבין המבוגר, העולה החדש לישראל, ברורה. בשני המקרים שלב המעבר אינו קל ואף מפחיד. אך לגבי סיפורו של סבא סרגי אין כמובן מקום אחר בעולם שבו ניתן לספר סיפור שכזה ולקבלו בתום לב ובאמון. אז אולי לא רואים במציאות הרבה סבים לומדים עם ילדי כיתה א' אך הסיפור אינו בדיוני מפני שהוא מתרחש בישראל. מדינה שהחיים והמוות בה הם מפיגוע לפיגוע אך ממשיכה לתפקד כמפלט ובית לכולנו. אוהבים אותך, ישראל.

About Food

Dear Norene

On my media tour for my latest cookbook, The Food Processor Bible, I did cooking classes in kitchens across the country, autographed cookbooks, was interviewed by the media, did cooking segments on TV and was a guest on several radio talk shows. I was even invited for dinner by several brave souls!

One of the highlights of my trip was meeting Susan Mendelson, owner of The Lazy Gourmet in Vancouver. Her latest cookbook bears the same name as her bistro and catering company. The Lazy Gourmet (Whitecap Books, 191 pp, $19.95) is filled with scrumptious recipes and wonderful colour photos. Although her book is not kosher, many recipes can be adapted easily.

Here are two tempting recipes that were "on the menu" when I visited The Lazy Gourmet. They will be perfect for your Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations. Enjoy!

GRILLED SEASONAL VEGETABLES

1 bulb fennel, cut in half
1 1/2 cups zucchini, cut diagonally into 1/4-inch slices
2 1/2 cups red, orange and yellow bell peppers, cut in half
1 1/2 cups Japanese eggplant, cut diagonally into 3/8-inch slices
1 1/2 cups portobello mushrooms, cut into 6 wedges and gills removed 1/4 cup olive oil
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Preheat barbecue or broiler to hot. Toss vegetables in olive oil. Grill over high heat till tender but not mushy. The zucchini will only take about 3 minutes, followed by the peppers, eggplant and portobello mushrooms. Fennel will take the longest to grill, about 7 to 8 minutes.

Remove vegetables to a serving platter. When cooled, season with salt and pepper and toss lightly with a balsamic vinaigrette, using 1 part vinegar to 4 parts olive oil. Serve at room temperature. Serves 8.

ROCKY ROADS

1 cup butter
2 lbs. semi-sweet chocolate, melted
1 10-oz. (285-g) bag mini-marshmallows
1 1/2 cups hazelnuts, toasted (see below)
2 cups whole almonds, toasted (see below)

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a 9 x 13-inch baking pan.

Melt butter and chocolate in the top of a double boiler. Let cool. Stir marshmallows and nuts into cooled chocolate mixture. Spread into prepared pan. Refrigerate for 2 to 3 hours. Cut into small squares. Makes 20 squares.

Toasting Nuts: Toast on a cookie sheet in a preheated 375 F oven to a light golden colour, about 6 to 8 minutes. To ensure all pieces are toasted, do not pack them too tightly on the sheet. For hazelnuts, cool slightly, then place in a towel and rub vigorously. The skins will remain on the towel.

Canadian had pivotal role in creating Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

John Ross

TORONTO — Most Jews with an interest in Israeli history are familiar with the story.

In November 1947, the United Nations General Assembly gathered for a historic vote. Presented with a report from the UN Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), the General Assembly voted by a two-thirds majority to accept the committee's recommendation to partition British-controlled Palestine into two states, one Jewish, one Palestinian, with Jerusalem retaining independent status.

Despite the war waged against it by its Arab neighbours, the State of Israel was born almost six months later. This year, it celebrates its 54th birthday.

Today it seems inconceivable to consider anything other than a two-state solution for the Middle East conflict. But what if the General Assembly had not voted the way it did? What if, instead of contemplating a recommendation to partition British mandate territory, it had been presented with a recommendation for a unitary state with a permanent Jewish minority?

Leaders meet Graham

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As The CJN went to press Monday, Jewish communal leaders held their first-ever meeting with Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham, partly to discuss recent statements Graham made about the escalating crisis in Israel, but also to show appreciation for a perceptible shift in Canadian voting at the United Nations.

Only a few weeks ago, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) was stinging from Graham's speech to its annual policy luncheon, at which the minister rebuked Israel for its conduct in the current crisis. Now, the Israel lobby has some praise for Canada's voting at the UN, even speaking of a "mini-breakthrough" when it comes to votes affecting Israel.

That shift is being seen in Canada's voting at the annual meeting in Geneva of the UN's Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR), and in other language Canada has adopted over the past few weeks.

Community officials believe that Israel's plea to Canada prior to the start of the Geneva meetings – asking Ottawa to vote against anti-Israel resolutions and to force votes on them – may be affecting overall Canadian policy in the region.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Day Named Critic

OTTAWA — The appointment of former Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day as his party's foreign affairs critic has been welcomed by the Canada-Israel Committee. Day, who has been a strong supporter of Israel and critic of the Palestinians, "has been very straightforward and very forceful in his support of Israel and I'd be surprised if he was to enunciate any other position," said CIC national chair Joseph Wilder. Day's appointment was blasted by Canadian Arab groups. However, Alliance MP Rahim Jaffer, a Muslim who advocates a balanced approach to the conflict, was named deputy foreign affairs critic for the Middle East.

Caplan Criticized

THORNHILL, Ont. — The Canadian Alliance riding association in Thornhill has taken Liberal MP and cabinet minister Elinor Caplan to task for failing to speak out on the Middle East. Riding association president Dan Samson challenged Caplan to denounce recent government statements on the Mideast crisis. "I am outraged that our very own member of Parliament and a representative of the Jewish community does not have the strength or moral principals to denounce such blatant appeasement of terrorists and terrorism," Samson said in a statement.

Survivor Dies

MONTREAL — Chaike Spiegel, one of the last survivors of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, died here recently at age 81. Spiegel joined the Jewish underground in Nazi-occupied Poland and fought in the ghetto uprising that began in April, 1943. She and her husband, Boruch, were among some 50 Jewish resistance fighters who escaped the ghetto in May, 1943.

ISRAEL

Bibi's Back

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu has agreed to serve as a spokesperson for the Israeli government, to "help clarify and present Israel's positions," an official said. Netanyahu's assistance was sought by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, despite the fact Netanyahu will likely challenge Sharon eventually for the Likud Party leadership.

France Singled Out

JERUSALEM — The current wave of anti-Semitism in Europe is the worst since World War II, according to Avi Becker, secretary-general of the World Jewish Congress. Becker last week presented the findings of an annual report on anti-Semitism, conducted by Tel Aviv University. The report singled out France, saying there were more than 50 major anti-Semitic attacks there in 2001 involving the use of weapons.

Aid For Reservists

JERUSALEM — Hebrew University is offering financial aid to students called up for reserve duty in combat units. Students called up for three weeks or longer will be eligible for grants of up to $350 (US) to help cover costs of tutors, photocopying notes and other expenses incurred while trying to catch up on studies missed during reserve duty.

WORLD

Arrests Made

PARIS — More than 35 people have been arrested in France for recent attacks against Jews. Nine of those were arrested in connection with the recent firebombings of three synagogues; the others for verbal or physical abuse. Fifteen of those arrested are minors, most of whom, said an official, had been in trouble with the police before.

Agunot Meeting

NEW YORK — L'Maan B'nos Yisrael International, dedicated to helping the plight of agunot, is holding its third annual conference, Approaches to Dealing with the Agunah Crisis, on April 28 at Yeshivah of Flatbush, in Brooklyn. Private meetings can be arranged with participating rabbis, or with Mattie Klein, president and founder of the organization. For details, call 718-338-0833.

Calling Massadniks

NEW YORK — Camp Massad is planning a reunion to coincide with its 60th anniversary, to take place April 21 at 60 East 78th Street, N.Y. Former Massadniks are urged to contact Minahel@Camp Massad.com or write to Camp Massad Reunion Committee, 60 Cutter Mill Road, Suite 512, Great Neck, New York, U.S.A., 11021.

Congress pulls out of interfaith meetings

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A spring meeting of the Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation (CCJC) has been cancelled because Canadian Jewish Congress has refused to participate.

Keith Landy, CJC national president, said in a statement that Congress has suspended its participation in the CCJC – an interfaith liaison committee that includes the Anglican, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, United and Lutheran churches and has met about three times a year for the last 30 years – because CCJC does not support Israel in its fight against Palestinian terrorists.

Landy said he is also disappointed by the silence of the churches on the incidents of anti-Semitic violence in Canada.

"The last straw," Landy said, was a statement by Archbishop Michael Peers, primate of the Anglican Church in Canada, on the increasingly bloody battles between Palestinians and Israelis.

The archbishop's message, which was posted on the church's Web site, said that Israel is occupying Palestinian areas illegally and that the plight of Palestinians has been overlooked by the world.

Landy called the statement "which purports to be a call for peace with justice, a one-sided indictment of Israel, blaming the plight of the Palestinian people and the current crisis solely on Israel's so-called illegal occupation of the disputed territories.

"There is nothing in this message that holds the corrupt and despotic Palestinian Authority accountable for the misery of its own people."

PA not being held accountable for 'misery of its own people'

The archbishop's statement completely ignores the perspective of Israel and the Jewish people, who seek peace with security, Landy said.

"The Archbishop makes a complex series of issues into a facile zero-sum game in which support for the Palestinian people must be matched with harsh, unjust and unfair condemnation of Israel.

"Although caustic criticism of Israel appears forthcoming, we wonder why the churches are so silent in the face of the suicide terrorism that Israel experiences on a daily basis. Why have we not heard a single condemnation of the global wave of Middle East related anti-Semitism resurgent since the autumn of 2000, not only in Europe and elsewhere but right here in Canada?"

Archbishop Peers could not be reached by The CJN's deadline. His office said he was was attending church meetings overseas.

Rev. Bruce Gregersen, the United Church of Canada's scretary for interfaith relations, said he is saddened but not surprised by Landy's announcement.

"I know that we have had profound disagreements in interpreting what is actually going on in the Middle East, and particularly what the pathway is to a just peace."

Rev. Gregersen said his church continues to be comitted to dialogue and is available to resume conversation at any time.

In his statement, Landy said it is "sheer hypocrisy for the rest of the world to declare war on terrorism, but not when it's being brought into the homes and seder tables of the Israeli people."

Christians need to express compassion for the Palestinians without slamming Israel, he said in an interview. "Clearly, the plight of the Palestinians is in the hands of the Palestinian leadership.

"Why do [Palestinian leaders] feel the need to arm the Palestinians when they could be spending the money to improve their living conditions?"

CJC has decided to suspend its participation in the meetings until further notice, Landy said. "We will continue to engage in interfaith dialogue with all people of good will in the hope of sharing a vision of the Middle East that truly represents peace for all peoples in the region with justice and security."

In the beginning I was jealous that Shoshi was killed and I survived ...

Like other victims of terrorism, Michal Ganon's life has been changed permanently as the fight for freedom continues and as Israel's very existence is being threatened.

"November 22, 2000, was just another regular day at the drug store in Hadera where I worked. My best friend and co-worker, Shoshi Reis and I decided to go for some pizza after work. This was the fatal decision!

I was paying for our pizza and suddenly was thrown to the ground by an enormous explosion. Everything around me turned hazy. Chaos surrounded me.

My body was riddled with pain but I knew that I was alive. I kept calling out for Shoshi, yet never heard her voice again. The suicide bomber had killed her.

My left leg was blown off my body and my right leg had to be amputated. Being 23 years old and having to spend the rest of my life in a wheelchair made me jealous of Shoshi. She, at least, did not have to suffer like I did.

I felt very disoriented as I no longer belonged in the able-bodied world but could not come to terms with being disabled.

It was only at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv where I started to feel comfortable and discovered that there was a place where I could fit in and be accepted.

At Beit Halochem I have met wonderfully warm and supportive new friends. I use the fitness centre regularly and see the physiotherapist as part of my ongoing rehabilitation. I don't know if I would have ever come out of my depression if it were not for the physical and emotional help that I receive at Beit Halochem."

PLEASE ASSIST the 50,000 disabled war veterans and the many victims of terrorism who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their recovery.

From the editor's desk

One of the great blessings of being associated with The CJN is the relationship it confers with the paper's readers. Our readership is widely diverse, encompassing the spectrum of religious observance, age, education, economic background, cultural, institutional, geographic and other affiliations. Generalizations about our readers, therefore, are somewhat risky. But it is not stretching truth to say that, as a group, they are well-read, well-informed, opinionated, critical, articulate, passionately committed to Israel and the Jewish people, and of course, highly demanding of the paper.

The staff at The CJN receive many phone calls from our readers.

Generally, they call to offer opinions; to seek clarification on items they may have read in our paper or in other news media; to seek information about events happening in the community; to suggest story ideas; occasionally, to praise, but more frequently, to criticize; but always to find out about things happening in Israel.

Last Wednesday, I received a number of phone calls, the gist of three of which I record here.

It was the day after Yom Hashoah. It was also the day after 13 IDF soldiers died in the ambush in Jenin, the horrible details of which were just then emerging.

Emotions in the community were closer to the surface than normal. There was a palpable feeling among some people that their sense of personal security, even here, was being undermined.

The first caller was a man, who, it became clear, was at least in his mid-to-late seventies. Had I seen a recent telecast in which Barbara Walters had discussed with a Saudi Arabian official the nature of the Saudi educational curriculum, he wanted to know.

I told him I had not.

He then advised me, politely, in some detail, of the crude anti-Semitism that infuses Saudi schools, that permeates Saudi society at all levels – on the street, in the market places, in the media and in the universities.

I told the caller that I was generally aware of the anti-Semitic nature of Saudi society, of the anti-Jewish blood libel that appeared recently in a leading newspaper there, and of the fact that Saudi officials recently, and perhaps still, distributed copies of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion to visitors.

He asked me if The CJN knew what was being taught about the Jews in the private Muslim schools in Toronto. I responded that I did not. He suggested it might be a good project for The CJN to find out. I agreed, and said we would try.

His voice began to trail off somewhat and I understood our conversation was about to end. Then he said, as much to himself as to me, that the things he was reading in the newspaper these days reminded him of the things he had read in the newspaper before World War II.

The second caller was a younger man, of a generation closer to mine, born after the war.

He wanted to know if I could help him refine the contents of a letter he had written to his member of Parliament, Elinor Caplan. He was unnerved, shaken and worried by events unfolding in Israel and in Europe. He could no longer abide the feeling that there was nothing he could do to help. He had to do something, he said, in addition to praying, to reciting Tehillim, to calling family and friends in Israel, to rallying the emotions of others.

He needed to convey to the government his anger and deep disappointment at their policies, which he felt were equivocal and drew false parallels between the Palestinians' acts of terror and Israel's acts of self-defence.

We talked about the one-sided, media reporting against Israel, which in the main was now deluged with images of menacing Israeli tanks and pitiable Palestinian rubble. He was in mid-sentence when I heard his breath catch, his voice crack and his emotions break down. He began to cry. He tried to speak but could not. Then, just as quickly as his emotions overcame him, he caught his breath and apologized, unnecessarily, for the breakdown in conversational decorum.

I thanked him for the call, commended him for his resolve, wished him well and bade him chazak v'amatz, that he be able to find strength and courage.

The third caller was a teenager. She wanted to know if we had any details of the upcoming rally being planned in Washington. I shared with her as much information as I knew.

It was important that I commend her as well, merely for contemplating joining the rally. As I was in mid-sentence, she too began to cry. With all the ache and fear that poured from her soul, she sobbed, "We are going to lose Israel."

Straining to hold on to the composure that was now slipping away from me, and holding back the tears that were welling in my eyes, I assured her that "Israel would never be lost."

There are forces at work in heaven and beyond protecting Israel, I told the young caller, that are far greater than mere human forces and that the Jewish people would surely be rewarded for the concern, commitment and love that young people like her felt for the Jewish State.

Three callers, three generations.

Israel lives in us all.

The reflections that will appear in this space next week will be written from Israel.

Walk TALK

Israel, We're With You!

UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is now underway and one of the best ways to participate is by joining the Walk with Israel on May 20.

Israel's situation is so urgent that UJA Federation is starting Campaign 2003 four months earlier than scheduled to raise funds for social services that are strained to the limit.

The Campaign includes many programs designed to let you – members of our concerned community – say, "Israel, we're with you!" That's why this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel on Monday, May 20, starting and ending at SkyDome, is so crucial.

"There's no doubt that this year's Walk with Israel is absolutely vital in terms of showing our support for Israel. People who want to make a difference in the lives of Israelis should come out for what promises to be an incredible event," says Abe Glowinsky, Chair, along with Elyza Polsky, of the Walk with Israel.

"Due to the situation in Israel, this year's Walk takes on a different tone. It will still be a great way to spend a day with friends and family, but most importantly, it will let the people of Israel know 'we're with you!'" says Polsky.

Rain or shine, this year's UJA Federation Walk with Israel promises to be the biggest and the best. We're expecting at least 10,000 participants.

Come out and support Israel while enjoying the sights and sounds of the Walk with Israel Festival - great entertainment, fabulous prizes, the best in Kosher food, and much, much more!

Palestinian-backed tour concerns Liberal MP

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A Liberal backbencher well-regarded in the Jewish community fears his fellow MPs will be used as propaganda pawns when they take part in a Palestinian-sponsored trip to the Middle East next month.

Joe Volpe, MP for Eglinton-Lawrence, which has a sizeable Jewish population, downplayed reports that the trip has caused a rift in the Liberal caucus. But he says the mission does "underline the fact that there are differences in our caucus when it comes to Israel and the Palestinians."

Joseph Volpe

Last week, Volpe made headlines when he said that a decision by nine MPs, including four of his fellow Liberals, to accept a visit to the West Bank paid for by Palestine House in Toronto, was wrong.

Volpe said the MPs would be used in the Palestinian propaganda war.

"I can't believe that serious-thinking men and women wouldn't see the dangers of being used as propaganda tools," Volpe told The CJN in an interview.

"You're in the middle of a war. One side calls you over, and you go, at their expense. Give me a break. How can you do that? What parliamentarian would go? It's problematic."

Volpe said it's highly unlikely that participating MPs will get an even-handed view of the situation from their Palestinian sponsors.

He said that's the main difference between the mission and the annual trip for Canadian parliamentarians sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

"The CIC trip is an ongoing one to sensitize people. They try to give everyone a complete flavour of what's going on. I can't think of one occasion where an MP was denied an opportunity to go anywhere."

On one past CIC mission, two Liberal MPs visited the Palestinian territories, Volpe said.

On the Palestine House-sponsored trip, "I don't know what [MPs] will accomplish by going into refugee camps, or where the violence is taking place. Precious little will be accomplished."

He noted that a recent high-profile trip to Palestinian areas by NDP MP Svend Robinson was "set out to ensure that the media would focus on Svend. And the media complied."

Volpe acknowledged that the invitation from Palestine House came before Israel launched its offensive in the West Bank. "But my problem is that it will actually take place, now."

He said the issue has been raised at "senior levels," including with foreign affairs minister Bill Graham and with the Prime Minister's Office. "This is not just a caucus issue," Volpe said.

He described MPs planning to go on the trip as generally even-handed on the Middle East. But he conceded that none is known to be pro-Israel.

Fellow Liberal MP and human rights expert Irwin Cotler, the representative for Mount Royal, said he has no objection to the mission "as long as it's organized around guidelines of fairness and openness and gives a plurality of views. I would hope members would hear all perspectives."

Participating Liberal MPs are Colleen Beaumier, Dan McTeague, Roger Gallaway, and Carolyn Parrish.

Also slated to attend are Bloc Québécois MPs Réal Ménard and Stéphane Bergeron; Alliance MP Art Hanger; Libby Davies from the NDP, and Quebec Independent Jean-Guy Carignan.

Beaumier was quoted last week as saying that she cannot be bought with a $3,000 trip to the Middle East. "That's not my price… It's a cheap shot," she reportedly said, while McTeague said he plans to visit the region with an open mind.

Associated Read-for-a-Need raises $85,000 for ambulance

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

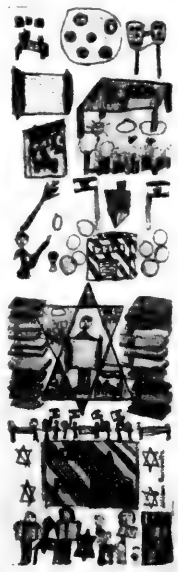
TORONTO — At Associated Hebrew Day Schools, reading books can save lives.

In an integrated fund-raising project, Associated launched a Read-for-a-Need program in January to encourage students to support Israel by working towards the purchase of an ambulance.

The program raised close to $85,000, surpassing the initial goal of $71,000 needed to purchase a Magen David ambulance, said Randy Spiegel, director of development and public relations at Associated.

Over the past few months, 78 ambulances have been lost in Israel and a March 21 Jerusalem Post article noted that Magen David Adom is currently in debt.

Vice-principal Judy Cohen developed the Read-for-a-Need program in an effort to promote literacy and, at the same time, to encourage community support for Israel, Spiegel said.



Students prepared bookmarks as part of their read-a-thon.

Students were taught that the Jewish people are the people of the Book, he noted, and that reading fosters intellectual and social growth. They were encouraged to pursue creative fund-raising projects around the theme of books and reading.

Initiailly, the kids prepared bookmarks that were given out to sponsors and supporters.

"Over 30,000 bookmarks were printed," Spiegel said.

Older students were asked to get pledges for pages or chapters completed and parents were encouraged to read to their younger children.

As the program went on, a Grade 4 class put together a cookbook on fruit that sold out, Spiegel said.

In the end, over one million pages were read by the kids at all campuses over the month.

Students embraced the project because it was about ambulances and human lives, not politics or religion, Speigel said.

Annan's dangerous falsehoods

As a result of the many unfair, morally inverted, hypocritical responses to Israel's war against terror, Jews around the world are feeling an increasing sense of existential isolation. For example, demonstrators in European capitals protest against the "apartheid" state of Israel; marchers rally against the "racist" Jewish state.

The use of such terminology is as false as it is deliberate and mischievous. Israel is neither apartheid nor racist. Indeed if the term "apartheid" can be used at all, it is appropriate to do so in reference to such "moderate" states as Saudi Arabia or Jordan, where it is forbidden for a non-Muslim even to own land, let alone to enjoy any other of the political and legal rights incidental to Israeli and other western societies.

In the campaign against Israel, however, falsehoods, are the norm. We expect them, although we bridle no less when we hear them from spokespeople of the totalitarian, despotic regimes aligned against Israel. We expect them, too, from the rabid ideologues on both the far right and far left, for whom Jews (as embodied by Israel) are the avatars of world domination and economic conspiracy.

But we do not expect falsehoods to be propagated by world leaders, by persons having important international responsibility. Yet falsehoods have also spilled, alas, from the secretary general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, even as they have from the secretary general of the Arab League.

Last month, Annan denounced Israel's occupation of the lands it seized in the Six Day War as "illegal." The use of the term by the secretary general was not only infelicitous and inaccurate, it was dangerous. For, as the Canada-Israel Committee pointed out in correspondence it sent to Annan, such "characterization... may encourage continued Palestinian violence against Israel as 'justified resistance.'"

Others too have pointedly called the secretary general to account for his careless use of language. Columbia University law professor George Fletcher wrote in the New York Times: "Using the term 'illegal' [in reference to the occupied territories] is destructive and dangerous. For the uninformed, the discussion will start with the secretary general's labelling of the occupation as a violation of law... Those who pay attention to the details of history know better."

In a subsequent letter to the editor of the Times, Annan's spokesperson, Frederic Eckhard clarified that the use of the term "illegal" referred to "Israel's failure," according to the secretary general, "in the five years that have since elapsed, to accept the legal obligations that the status of an occupying power carries with it" and not to the occupation itself.

It therefore leaves one to ask why the secretary general would have been so careless with his language in the first place as to leave on the public record a falsehood regarding Israel's occupation of the disputed territories, and why he has not publicly corrected the record since.

Dismayed at Robinson

I was dismayed to watch Svend Robinson try to visit Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in the midst of the war in Israel. Was this an appropriate time to go for a stroll in Ramallah? Robinson could have knocked on Arafat's door any time in the past 18 months of violence. Together they could have demolished pizzas and lattés before the Passover massacre, each keeping an eye on the door.

Robinson got televised coverage at the expense of his dignity. The NDP are all but forgotten today and his stunt was a misguided attempt to put them back into the consciousness of the Canadian public.

I have supported the ideals of the NDP since I was able to vote more than three decades ago. I always admired Robinson for his outspoken courage in the fight for gay and human rights. But the way he stuck his nose in a place, manner and time where it does not belong has shaken my belief that the NDP can lead this country.

It's time to act

As the war in the West Bank and Israel gets worse, it is time for bold black headlines in The CJN demanding, in very strong terms, that the Canadian Government denounce suicide bombers and anti-Semitic, Middle Eastern, government sponsored media. Only when the suicide bombers stop can Canada say that Israel's use of force is excessive. Only when publishing hatred is stopped will there be peace. The Canadian government must choose whether they are for or against the existence of Israel. There is no middle ground. As U.S. President George W. Bush said, they are either for us or against us. If they are for us, that is fine; if against us, we must determine how to act.

The CJN must also strongly encourage its readers to write to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham and local newspapers demanding that they stand for a truly peaceful solution, and not waver in their support for Israel. It is not enough for Jews to mumble platitudes of support for Israel. Now is the time to act decisively by writing or doing other supportive actions. Inaction is not sufficient. If we are not for ourselves, who will be for us?

Two-state solution necessary

We deplore the many barbaric terrorist attacks against Israelis and mourn with our friends and relatives in Israel. We realize Israel must defend itself against such brutality, as would any nation. Yet we fear that military responses without serious political initiatives – the stick without the carrot – will not bring peace. At best, military strikes will produce a lull in the violence. At worst – and we have seen the situation worsening over the past 18 months – they invite revenge and escalation. As has been said, the "terrorist infrastructure" is in the hearts of Palestinians, not just in the minds and basements of a few groups. Changing the Palestinian public's support for suicide bombers seems impossible right now, yet Israel must try.

This can only be done if Israel declares its readiness for a two-state solution that offers the Palestinians a viable homeland. True, former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak offered that at Camp David and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat foolishly rejected it. But Prime Minister Ariel Sharon also rejected the terms of the Clinton plan and his stance has not significantly changed.

Most Israelis support a two-state solution and an end to the occupation (albeit not a return to the exact 1967 borders). Though Jews should demand action against terrorism, we should also welcome, and promote, every initiative toward a two-state solution.

Annan should have resigned

UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan is under judgment.

The United Nations Security Committee recently passed Resolutions 1402 and 1403 relating to Israel's military operations against the terrorists in the West Bank. On April 8-11, there was a conference in Jerusalem called "The Legacy of Holocaust Survivors: The Moral and Ethical Implications for Humanity." Annan was invited, but did not come. Had he attended, he might have protested the resolutions and resigned.

In fact, Annan should have resigned with the Palestinian "uprising." In 1967, the Security Council passed Resolutions 242 and 338, which demanded that Israel "withdraw from occupied territories." It did not say "the," let alone "all the" occupied territories. It clearly was Annan's duty to enforce these resolutions or, if unable to, to resign. Had he done so, there might have been no war.

Ivan Rand and the UNSCOP papers

This is the first part of a two-part article. Part 2 will be published next week.

By JOHN ROSS

Last December, I found myself disturbed by comments made by Liberal Senator Marcel Prud'homme who, as quoted in Hansard (House of Commons daily debates), gave a particularly vicious diatribe against three of Israel's prime ministers (Ariel Sharon, Menachem Begin and Moshe Sharett). He also directed his fellow senators to look back to the United Nations (UN) and the General Assembly resolution of Nov. 29, 1947, in order to find the reason for the current difficulty in the Middle East.

To the applause of his senate colleagues, he said, "A great man... [former Canadian prime minister] Lester Pearson helped implement a report written by another great Canadian from the Supreme Court, which called for two states in the land of Palestine, one for the Jews, one for the Palestinians – of course, with no consultation from the Palestinians."

The intent of Prud'homme's revisit to the past was clearly twofold. Firstly, he wanted all Canadians to believe that as early as 1947, Israel has been acting in defiance of the UN's wishes by preventing the establishment of a Palestinian state. Secondly, he wanted Canadians to take the failure of the creation of a Palestinian state as a personal affront to the memory of the two pre-eminent Canadians who supported the rights of the Palestinians.

I have always been aware of the fact that while at Flushing Meadows on Nov. 29, 1947, Pearson, who was then under-secretary of state for external affairs, helped Israel obtain the two-thirds majority vote required to pass the resolution in favour of the partition of Palestine. The Arab nations had sought a unitary independent Palestinian state in which the Jews would have no more than a one-third representation in an elected government, and so it was clearly recognized that a vote in favour of partition was an outright rejection of their position.

Furthermore, the historical record confirms that the Arabs had been consulted and were invited to appear before the UN or its committees. Therefore, I knew Prud'homme was quite wrong in his interpretation of events and that he gave a misleading "spin" on the partition resolution.

But what piqued my interest was the reference to the other Canadian referred to by Prud'homme, Supreme Court Justice Ivan Rand, who drafted the original recommendation that was the basis of the UN resolution. Although the details of his prestigious legal and judicial career were well known, little information has been available about his involvement in making the report. This is because the committee that he served on, the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), deliberated in secrecy; their meetings and discussions were never made public.

I wanted to find out more about Rand and his position on Palestine for two reasons. My first objective was to determine if his reasons for partition would either hinder or help present-day Canadian Jewry in combating the countless UN resolutions that attack Israel's legitimacy.

The Honourable Ivan C. Rand

My second reason, which was more personal, arose from the fact that Rand founded the University of Western Ontario Law School upon his retirement from the Supreme Court of Canada in 1960, the same law school that I attended.

I first looked for the government-published volume Documents on Canadian External Affairs (1947), which contains all formerly classified memorandums and correspondence of the External Affairs Department of the federal government. In the section on Palestine, I found several interesting telegrams and documents between Pearson, minister of external affairs Louis St. Laurent and prime minister Mackenzie King, which indicated that Canada tried strenuously not to be nominated as a member of UNSCOP, and that it lobbied both the United States and the United Kingdom to be kept off the committee.

Only after arm twisting by the United States did Canada reluctantly agree to be one of the 11 "neutral" states (Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, Guatemala, Iran, Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay and Yugoslavia) that would immediately visit Palestine and render a report outlining a solution for the problem by Aug. 31, 1947. But in order to diminish the anticipated political fallout from having been forced to make a decision on the touchy subject, the Canadian government decided that its representative on UNSCOP would be completely independent and not be given any instructions.

Out of a list of seven prominent Canadians, King selected Rand, who departed for Palestine via New York in June 1947. The Department of External Affairs provided Rand with a historical background paper as a guideline, but this memorandum must have been intended to neutralize him from making any decision on Palestine as it spoke of "two great historic tragedies... one Arab, the other Jewish."

The report also advised of the "futility" in determining which people have suffered the worst "catastrophe," and included a Jewish position paper that argued for one unitary Palestinian state and said that partition was not in the best interests of the Jews.

I then decided to call Western's law school to find out if Rand had left behind any memoirs or articles about the time he served on UNSCOP. The library staff said they doubted there would be anything, as Rand never wrote an autobiography, but that they would conduct a search. I was surprised to hear back from the senior librarian a few days later, and quite excited when she told me that she had located an old box marked "Palestine" containing UN papers marked "classified and confidential." I drove anxiously to London to examine the box's contents, and was overwhelmed to see that it contained the complete record of the UNSCOP hearings and deliberations.

Not only did the box also have copies of the position papers of the submissions presented by all of the various local and religious groups in Palestine, but it also contained the confidential reports of the British high commissioner, the verbatim reporting of all meetings and discussions, the individual position papers of each member of UNSCOP and the working drafts of the final report together with handwritten notes and amendments.

Also kept in the box were two important and interesting files. The first contained Rand's personal correspondence from government officials and various individuals living in Palestine, while the second contained the entire briefing report from External Affairs. No one could have dared imagine a more valuable treasure chest of information pertaining to Palestine in 1947 and so revealing of the world's attitude towards Jews and Zionism.

The material revealed that the UNSCOP delegates were completely divided on what they envisioned for Palestine. On Aug. 27, 1947, only four days before the report was due, the chairman realized they had "too many different proposals" and that "the upshot would be a disjointed, incoherent, and from the point of view of the assembly, largely unintelligible report." The only majority viewpoint at that time was of India, Iran, Yugoslavia and Peru, who announced that they were in favour of a unitary state.

The most gratifying for me, however, was reading that it was Rand who recognized the need for consensus in order to arrive at a single solution that would benefit the Jews. He rose to the forefront in the deliberations and forced his fellow delegates to reconsider their personal positions. By using his great ability as a conciliator, he proceeded to work on a draft final report that would eventually gain the majority support of seven of the 11 delegates.

When the delegate from India chided the other delegates favouring partition for not having specifics on partition boundaries, Rand kept his group working together, saying that it was more important to complete the report with a strong recommendation for partition, and only afterward would it be necessary to settle this issue. When the delegates finally had to delineate the boundaries for the two states, he persuaded his fellow members to give the Jewish state control over the Negev, a decision later opposed by many countries, including the United States. On Aug. 30, he argued and debated with the Indian delegate to ensure that the background reasons set out in the report were supportive of the historical right for a Jewish national homeland.

The UNSCOP papers clearly demonstrate that without Rand, there would not have been a final report that so thoroughly and persuasively recommended partition as the only viable way of helping the Jews in Palestine and the Diaspora. Without it, it is extremely unlikely that Israel would have obtained the two-thirds majority vote of the General Assembly on Nov. 29, 1947. Our debt to Rand, both as Jews and as Canadians, is immeasurable and should proudly be recorded in the history of Zionism and Israel.

Golden age for Canadian Jews?

Someone was good enough to send me a copy of an article that appeared in the National Post back in November, a piece I had not seen before. Written by Bob Harvey, it carried the headline of this article and a subheading: "Jewish life in Canada, second only to Israel, author of book says." The book Harvery is referring to is Prof. Morton Weinfeld's Like Everyone Else But Different (McClleland & Stewart, 2001).

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Weinfeld has taught sociology for many years at McGill University; his specialty is the sociology of North American Jews. The book's main point is simple but, as far as I know, it has not been made with his clarity and strength before. American Jews are far larger in number than those in Canada but, says Weinfeld, the latter excel in religious observance, identity and strength of their communities.

To support his thesis, Weinfeld quotes the following statistics: "One-third of American Jews have visited Israel; two-thirds of Canadian Jews have been to Israel. Canadian Jews are more likely to fast on Yom Kippur, and are more likely to be able to converse in Hebrew and Yiddish."

According to the author, one of the reasons for this difference is the fact that most American Jews were born in the United States, with only 10 per cent having been born abroad, while in Canada, the latter figure is 30 per cent. Also, he says, ethnicity is a greater part of Canadian Jewish life. In Canada, Jews see themselves as a people, a group, more than just a religion. In the United States, on the other hand, many Jews view being Jewish as belonging to Judaism and worshipping as Jews, and not necessarily as being part of a Jewish grouping.

Furthermore, our Jewish community is the sixth largest in the world and the only one, Weinfeld says, that is growing. It attracts Jews from around the world, including Israelis. The World Jewish Congress is cited as saying: "The most impressive and consistent growth [of Jews] occurred in Canada, which in about three decades increased its Jewish population by 50 per cent."

Having lived for many years in the United States, and for the last 40 years in Canada, I find the distinctions that Weinfeld cites to be accurate and worth considering.

Maybe that is that is why I found Toronto and Canada easy to live in and to pursue my profession. It is a good land and one of its great features is the fact that it allows us to live our Judaism with intensity and in a climate of total freedom. Unfortunately, we do not always take full advantage of this great and unique opportunity.

New voices in the security debate

Ariel Sharon's support among Israelis will be put to the test halfway through his term as prime minister. The date of Israel's next election is related not to his election as prime minister in February 2000, but to the date of the last national election in 1999. As a result, even as the battle against Palestinian terrorism continues, the political wheels are already in motion for a return to the polls in the spring of 2003. That election will mark a return to Israel's old one-ballot system, in which there is no distinction between a vote for a party and a vote for prime minister.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

The most interesting developments are taking place in the centre of the political map, in the vacuum left by Labour's participation in Sharon's government. This is fuelled by a dissatisfaction with Sharon's apparent lack of a meaningful political strategy vis-a-vis the Palestinians (as distinct from focused military action to weaken the terrorist infrastructure), and doubts about the capacity of Labour head Binyamin Ben-Eliezer for national leadership.

Political pundits are placing early bets on three individuals, without a sense, as yet, of what role they might play, or within what kind of party framework. All come from a military or security background – a key asset in Israeli political life – and have dealt directly with Palestinians in combat and negotiations. All have publicly taken issue with elements of Sharon's approach thus far.

Ami Ayalon, a former commander of the navy and head of the General Security Service (GSS), is currently active in the corporate and community sectors. He has stressed the need to act with as much restraint as possible in military action that involves contact with Palestinian civilians. He also favours a unilateral Israeli withdrawal within the West Bank to defensible lines that Israel will determine.

Amram Mitzna, mayor of Haifa for the last nine years, is viewed by many as one of the few generals who have made a successful transition to politics, albeit at the municipal level. Mitzna is thoughtful and tacitum, and known for his low-key, but firm, style. He was seriously wounded in the Six Day and Yom Kippur wars and received the highest military awards for bravery after both.

Mitzna is best known for his resignation from his IDF post as chief of the Central Command during the first intifadah due to disagreement with tactics employed. He, too, calls for a withdrawal to defensible lines. In the long run, says Mitzna, there is no military solution to the conflict with the Palestinians.

"The Palestinians have nothing to lose," he says. "We have a lot to lose. The country has to understand that Judea, Samaria and Gaza are a burden that will lead us downhill."

Yaacov Peri, head of the GSS from 1988 to 1995, and currently CEO of Cellcom, a successful telecommunications company, has recently announced his resignation from Cellcom and is considering a political career. He is articulate and opinionated, and he has met Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and other Palestinian leaders on numerous occasions.

Peri believes that, as the stronger party, Israel has to take the first step to move back to a political process, in a cautious, considered manner that will break the current deadlock. He believes there is potential to rebuild relations with Palestinian leaders around Arafat. Finally, he, too, believes that eventually Israel will have to leave the territories and to evacuate settlements.

Many view Ayalon, Mitzna and Peri as potential leaders on a national scale in the necessary debate over "the day after" the current military action. For the moment, they have been meeting informally with a group of corporate, academic and public figures and have refrained from taking the plunge into national politics.

By bringing the National Religious Party and its new, extreme leader, Effi Eitam, into the government and by also bringing back the National Unity party headed by Avigdor Liberman, Sharon has reinforced his position on the right and has re-ignited the debate over Labour's continued participation in cabinet. Either way, whether in or out of cabinet, the challenge to both Sharon and Labour's leadership from voices such as those of Peri, Mitzna and Ayalon will not go unnoticed.

What is the endgame?

I write this as U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell prepares to visit Israel. It is hard to know what the situation will be like next week. We live from newscast to newscast, often swamped by competing claims on our attention.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

One of the more recent short-term questions has arisen as part of the critical chorus directed against the incursions by the IDF into the Palestinian territories, after the Passover massacre in Netanya. But anxious supporters of Israel are also concerned. The question is usually posed using an overworked chess metaphor: What is the endgame? Specifically, when and how will Israel withdraw its troops, and how will the military campaigns translate into some lasting peace, or at least lasting security, for Israel?

Regardless of what one thinks about the morality or efficacy of the incursions, this question relies on a metaphor that is inappropriate.

Chess is usually played and analyzed as a three-part process involving an opening, a middle game and an endgame. In chess, there is no single endgame which can be predicted or anticipated for each and every opening. Rather, there are a large number of possible strategies, tactics and moves that may make sense, given how the game has unfolded. How the game unfolds is a product of an infinite array of combinations of moves.

The endgame refers to basic options, or principles of play, dealing with how to maximize advantages when many pieces are gone and the game has become analytically simpler. Just because a chess player knows how she will begin a match or why she selected a line of play does not mean she knows what the endgame will be. Indeed, much of chess involves reacting to the moves of an opponent. For both players, how to play the endgame depends on the pieces available and their position.

It is not a failure of Sharon's campaign that he may – or may not – have a clear sense of ultimate outcomes. In fact, there is every evidence that there are indeed well thought-out objectives. Israeli intelligence seems to have prepared the ground well. Weapons have been seized, suspected terrorists detained, relevant documents found. Even an alleged organizer of the Passover massacre has been killed.

But most decisions to wage war are made amid much uncertainty and unpredictability. After Pearl Harbor, the Americans declared war on Japan and Germany with little debate on any endgame. But things worked out. They did not in Vietnam.

There are never any guarantees, especially in the long run. Does anyone know the precise endgame the United States and its allies will use to conclude the campaign in Afghanistan? In the short run, at least, the Israeli incursions seem to have succeeded in cutting down suicide bombings. After the Passover massacre, there was little choice, and little doubt, that Israel would respond militarily by taking the war against terror into the Palestinian heartland. This is precisely what America has done in Afghanistan.

Early in the 20th century, America was faced with another case of international terror. The Mexican bandit Pancho Villa began stopping trains in Mexico and shooting Americans on board after the United States supported his political opponent. In 1916, Villa and his men raided Columbus, N.M., and killed 18 Americans. Gen. John Pershing led a U.S. expedition into Mexico. All Mexicans resented the incursion, and, in any event, Pershing failed to apprehend Villa.

In fact, a clear sense of a mythical "endgame" may be one of the least important factors in deciding whether or not to undertake military action.

There are existential and psychological imperatives that force nations to act, especially in self-defence. These actions can boost the morale of a besieged nation, and can serve to rally the population. They are often effective in the short run and can buy time as longer term options are worked out. They can also serve to change a static and blocked situation – such as may have existed in the Middle East prior to the incursions.

True, there is a risk that these incursions may so inflame Arab passions that talks become impossible. But other options, like the status quo or unilateral Israeli withdrawal from all or most of the West Bank and Gaza without any negotiated agreement, also carry risks. There are times when one has to act.

The Kirshner File

Palestinian terrorism forced Israel to react

A country has a right, indeed an obligation, to defend itself. This is elementary and beyond debate. Operation Defensive Shield, Israel's sweep in the West Bank, is designed to destroy, or at the very least, to disable the insidious and destructive terrorist infrastructure spawned by Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority (PA). Viewed in this perspective, Operation Defensive Shield is justifiable on both moral and military grounds.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During the past month, the bloodiest episode of the second Palestinian uprising, Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – an offshoot of Arafat's Fatah faction – unleashed an unprecedented reign of terror in Israel and the territories in which scores of Israelis died.

These atrocities, capped by the destruction of the Moment Café in Jerusalem, the Passover massacre in Netanya and the bombing of an Israeli Arab restaurant in Haifa, needlessly claimed the lives of 126 Israelis in March alone, a staggering death toll no self-respecting nation can tolerate. That is why Israel was forced to go to war.

The Palestinian suicide bombers who wreak havoc in Israeli cities have several objectives in mind, but, first and foremost, their malevolent goal is to disrupt the normal ebb and flow of life in Israel.

To a great extent, they have succeeded. My friend in Tel Aviv, a teacher and a devotee of la dolce vita, sent me this grim, heart-breaking, understated e-mail last week: "Most Israelis prefer staying at home rather than going out to restaurants at d cinemas. Many even do their shopping via the Internet. Imagine that last night all our friends came to us to watch a movie rather than going out as usual. This is bad, and has to change soon."

The pernicious campaign by the Palestinians to sow fear, despair and uncertainty in the hearts of Israelis, aided and abetted by Arab regimes, is but one facet of their crusade to terrorize and demoralize Israel.

Even pragmatic Palestinians who still push for a two-state solution believe that violence – a brazen breach of the late Oslo accords – is "the shortest road" to end Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, to quote Marwan Barghouti, a leading Fatah militant.

This is a questionable thesis, given Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's refusal to reward terrorism with political concessions, the corresponding hardening of Israeli public opinion concerning a fair and realistic resolution of the conflict, and the collapse of mutual trust.

More ominously, Israel continually faces the spectre of a rejectionist, racist wing of the Palestinian national movement that unalterably rejects Israel's rightful place in the region and, in Nazi-like fashion, contemptuously describes Jews as the descendants of monkeys and apes. Make no mistake. The despicable Islamic fundamentalist bombers from Hamas and Islamic Jihad, coddled far too long by the PA, are not merely fighting to wrest the West Bank and Gaza Strip from Israel's grasp, but to exterminate Israel as a Jewish state. Israel cannot compromise with such fanatics. It will not sign its own death warrant. This is clear.

Considering all these factors, Israel had no alternative but to launch Operation Defensive Shield on March 29. Ein breirah.

Lest we forget, the Palestinians resorted to violence after rejecting their best ever chance for statehood. Had they not squandered the opportunity presented at the Camp David summit, flawed though it was in their eyes, the situation today in the Middle East could have been rosier.

Rather than presenting a reasonable counter-offer and continuing negotiations until a deal was done, the Palestinians opted for a strategy of violence – blood and fire – to win statehood. In doing so, they helped shatter the promise of Oslo (Israel is also at fault here), betrayed the Israeli peace camp – which correctly understands that peace and occupation are intrinsically incompatible – and ensured Sharon's election as prime minister.

Alarmed by the spiralling bloodshed and chaos – which threatenes to spin out of control and engulf the Mideast in a regional war, as well as destabilize moderate Arab governments, spike up the price of crude oil and erode support for unseating Iraq's Saddam Hussein – the United States dispatched special envoy Anthony Zinni to the Mideast last month.

Prior to his arrival, Israel was reeling from a spate of bombings and shootings, the frequency of which shocked Israelis. To counter this wave of terrorism, the worst in Israel's history, Israel attacked PA bases and buildings and Palestinian refugee camps – incubators of suicide bombers – and tightened the cordon around Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah. Then, in deference to Zinni's mission, Sharon virtually halted the offensive.

Try as he might, and despite Sharon's belated decision to abandon his insistence on seven days of complete calm before entering into ceasefire talks with the PA, the hapless Zinni, for the third time since last year, failed to hammer out a truce. The Palestinians demanded a so-called political horizon, ceasefire talks held in tandem with parallel political negotiations aimed at bringing the prospect of Palestinian independence closer. Israel, however, was loath to discuss strictly political issues without nailing down a viable truce.

Israeli officials comb the wreck of the bus bombed on April 10.

The result? A frustrating impasse that has yet to be broken. U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell is now attempting to untie this Gordian knot.

In the wake of the Passover massacre on March 27, with columns of Israeli tanks and 20,000 reservists ready to storm into the Palestinian autonomous areas once more, Arafat suddenly expressed a willingness to implement "an immediate ceasefire." But it was too little and too late, Sharon already having declared Arafat an "enemy" and ordering Operation Defensive Shield, long advocated by Israeli forces on the right.

Sharon, having characterized the current offensive as "a battle for survival of the Jewish people [and] of Israel," believes that the Palestinians cannot be coaxed to the negotiating table unless they are "hit hard" and brought to the realization that "terrorism will achieve nothing."

Although this philosophy is questionable and may only deepen Palestinian antagonism, the vast majority of Israelis rightly support the basic aim of Operation Defensive Shield: the eradication of Palestinian terrorism. As my Israeli friend, a liberal, put it in her e-mail: "I am not sure whether this fighting will change anything, but it had to occur for the morale of the Israelis."

It stands to reason that if the United States could react militarily to Al Qaeda terrorism in a country thousands of kilometres from the ruins of the World Trade Centre in Manhattan, Israel has an identical right to crush terrorism in its own backyard. This is all the more true when you consider the fact that Israeli casualties have been proportionately much higher than those of the United States.

In the interests of maintaining its security and preserving its deterrent posture, Israel could not – and cannot – afford to sit on folded hands while its citizens were ruthlessly shot and blown to bits in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Netanya, Kfar Saba, Hadera, Nahariya and Umm al-Fahm.

Yet a military solution, favoured by Sharon and the Likud, has its limits, as we have plainly seen, and as Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer himself has suggested. Israel's incursions into the West Bank and Gaza since late February, its biggest raids in 20 years, did not squelch Palestinian terrorism. Nor, lamentably, has Operation Defensive Shield deterred suicide bombers, judging by the March 31 and April 10 bombings in Haifa and the April 12 bombing in Jerusalem.

Only a political solution – based loosely on Ehud Barak's and Bill Clinton's proposals, the Tenet plan, the Mitchell recommendations, Shimon Peres' and Ahmed Qureia's blueprint and Saudi Arabia's peace initiative – offers the best hope of mercifully ending the bloodletting and paving the way for an endgame.

Sharon's advocacy of long-term interim accords, his aversion to settling core problems, his devotion to settlements beyond the Green Line and his resistance to a nearly full withdrawal, are grave impediments on the march toward real peace. Similarly, Arafat's refusal to combat terrorism seriously, his calls to incitement, his idealization of "martyrs," and his fixation on the "right of return" are also formidable obstacles to a genuine rapprochement.

By now, both sides should know that peace can only be achieved through painful, historic compromises. Ultimately, Israel's bitter, draining dispute with the Palestinians cannot be settled by force.

"If it wasn't for my family, my good wife and Baycrest..."

Archie Wislesky suffered a massive stroke 18 years ago. If it wasn't for his family, his wife Goodie and Baycrest, Archie says he wouldn't be alive today.

"Once you get over the 'Why me', you get on with life," says Archie. "You can't quit."

Baycrest has played an important role in his recovery. After his stroke, he joined a ceramics class at the Wagman Centre. It opened the door to new experiences that would change his life for the better. Next came water therapy, dance therapy and now computer training.

"You could say that finding Baycrest was a stroke of luck!"

Holocaust survivors, victims remembered at CHAT

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust victims and survivors' individual stories were remembered at this year's Yom Hashoah ceremony at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

In various scenes, the performers delivered messages of hope, prompting the audience to remember but not allow the Holocaust to define who they are as Jews.

The program, which was written, produced and performed by students, addressed the issues of the day – Holocaust denial, the manipulation of history and the importance of speaking out during difficult times.

"We wanted every member to feel the connection with the victims," said Noah Zatzman, one of the play's co-ordinators.

The stories included the one of survivor Helen Schwartz, who told about her personal experiences, as well as dramatic excerpts that described the horrors faced by homosexuals and Jews during the war.

"It's our responsibility to remember everyone – Righteous Gentiles, homosexuals, Romas, all the Nazi victims," Zatzman said.

"But it's our duty to remember the Jewish victims," he added.

CHAT Headmaster, Paul Shaviv, told the audience that all post-Holocaust Jews are survivors.

As Israel faces challenging times, Shaviv told the audience that it's as if each one of them received an army draft call asking them to stand up and be counted.

Am Yisrael (the nation of Israel) is made up of individual survivors and "if we don't stand up, Am Yisrael will end with us," Shaviv said.

"We identify with the State of Israel, but we must also always remember that every human being is created in the image of God."

"We are commanded to defend ourselves, but not to hate our enemies," Shaviv said.

YOM HASHOAH: More than 2,000 people gathered at Earl Bales Park for the recent Holocaust community commemoration, the largest outside of Israel. The program, titled Voices of the Survivors: Reflections on the Future, featured talks by Zahavit Ben Hillel, Consul, State of Israel, Toronto and Western Canada; and survivors Sally Wasserman and Max Eisen. In a candlelighting ceremony in memory of the six million Jews who died in the Holocaust, six candles were lit by survivors, their children and their grandchildren. The assembly opened and closed with a reading of the names of those who died, and with a March on the Colours by General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion and Jewish War Veterans of Canada. Also featured were readings and songs by Hebrew day school students.

The commemoration, co-chaired by Lou Greenbaum and Craig Rimer, was sponsored by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation; B'nai Brith Canada; Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association; Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; Consulate General of Israel; General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion; Jewish Campus Services; Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada; Jewish War Veterans; Toronto Vaad Haraboneim. A second community Holocaust remembrance assembly at Beth Radom Congregation was sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association. It featured Ben Hillel, Rabbi Steven Schonblum of Beth Radom Congregation and Cantor Rudi Bromberg. [Photos by Carolyn Blackman]

Greater Toronto Area

From El Al to L.A.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These have been trying times for El Al, Israel's national airline. As tourist traffic to the Jewish state has declined, so has the carrier's financial well being.

Still, the Toronto office of the national air carrier has been holding its own and last week it announced two developments designed to increase the airline's traffic.

On April 7, "fifth freedom" aviation rights took effect, allowing El Al to offer direct flights between Toronto and Los Angeles, without any ties to an Israeli destination. In addition, a new Platinum seat class – replacing business class – was introduced for all 747-400, 777 and 767-ER aircraft. The Platinum class offers business travellers a more comfortable flying experience with more comfortable seats and other amenities, said Stanley Morais, director of sales and marketing in El Al's Toronto office.

The U.S.-destination flights are part of a larger route, Tel Aviv-Toronto-Los Angeles, which the airline has been flying since December. The added non-stop flight allows El Al to compete for traffic to the popular Southern California destination, Morais said.

Under the spring schedule now in effect, El Al offers three flights per week to Israel, departing on Sunday, Tuesday and Thursday around 10:30 p.m. A fourth Wednesday night flight will be added for the summer season, which runs from June 23 to Sept. 1.

The airline's announcement comes in the midst of difficult times for the aviation industry in general, and El Al in particular, due to the violence that has been raging in Israel for 16 months.

Morais acknowledged the airline has taken a hit from the drop in tourist traffic, but said it has held up well compared to other airlines.

What's more, El Al's percentage of occupied seats on the Toronto-Tel Aviv route has actually risen to 85 per cent in the first two months of 2002, compared to 80 per cent the year before. That's due in part to the substantial number of American passengers from Los Angeles now flying through Toronto, Morais said.

In 2001, passenger traffic on the Toronto-Tel Aviv route declined by 15 per cent compared to 2000, from 45,000 to 38,000, he added.

The airline has worked hard to reduce expenses, consolidate routes and improve service in a bid to retain and reclaim market share, Morais said.

Despite the improvements on some routes, El Al is in the red because of the violence in the Middle East.

The airline lost $45 million (US) in its most recent fiscal year as a result of the intifadah, but that figure could have been much higher, Morais said. At one time, analysts expected the airline to take a $90 million (US) hit, but "a combination of smarts, utilizing our aircraft properly, being competitive on costs and security after 9/11 have played a role" in limiting the airline's losses, he said.

Prior to the outbreak of the intifadah, the carrier's prospects appeared bright. "El Al was in the black, the situation was very good and the outlook was very good."

With the onset of the violence, sales to Christian groups visiting Israel, once a key part of the airline's passenger load, fell dramatically, though Jewish groups made up some of the shortfall. Prior to the intifadah, 80 per cent of the airline's passengers were Christians visiting Israel, while 20 per cent came from the Jewish market. Since the intifadah began, those figures have reversed, Morais said

More Israelis are flying to Canada since the intifadah began, he said. Business trips, vacations and family visits account for some of the traffic, as does Canada's low dollar, which makes it an attractive destination for Israeli vacationers.

In addition, "people realize that El Al is the airline of Israel and when you travel El Al, you're supporting Israelis," Morais said.

El Al has also competed on service, improving dramatically what had always been considered one of the airline's major weaknesses, he added.

In late March, El Al introduced the Boeing 777 to the LA-Toronto-Tel Aviv route. The aircraft is the newest in the fleet and accommodates 288 passengers, compared to the 767's 195. The 777 features six first class seats (at a fare of $12,140 Cdn each), 40 Platinum seats (around $3,000) and the remainder in economy class.

Under the new Platinum service, passengers will be allowed to check in an extra piece of luggage, enjoy a more spacious cabin, have greater seat pitch (allowing them to recline), receive a power outlet for laptop computers and be offered a wider meal selection.

Israel is on the line. It's an emergency.

Sunday, April 28 is Israel Emergency Sunday, when a UJA Federation volunteer will be calling on behalf of Israel Emergency Campaign 2003.

The severity of Israel's crisis has compelled us to initiate our campaign four months earlier than we originally planned. Increased gifts to UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 will be designated directly for social service programs to meet current emergency needs on behalf of Israel's vulnerable, including victims of terror. These are specially earmarked funds over and above our normal allocations to Israel.

A steady stream of terror is dealing a devastating blow to Israeli society, as the government is forced to shift funds from social programs to defense. We need to mobilize every member of our community to assist Israel during this emergency.

You can help by volunteering to call community members on Israel's behalf from Sunday, April 28 to Thursday, May 2 and by responding generously when contacted by a UJA Federation telethon volunteer.

Join hundreds of thousands of Jews across North America who have made an unprecedented commitment to provide hope for the people of Israel during these difficult days.

To volunteer for Israel Emergency telethons, please contact Donna Draycott, ddraycott@ujafed.org or 416.635.2883, ext. 320.

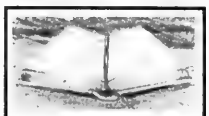
Jewish Life

A different kind of homelessness

By RABBI DANIEL KOMITO GOTTLIEB

Every other Sunday night, my congregation, Temple Kol Ami of Thornhill, Ont., sponsors and helps staff the StreetHelp Van, which roves the streets of downtown Toronto on a nightly basis, offering assistance to the city's homeless. The project is a joint endeavour of Ve'ahavta and The Native Men's Residence (Na-Me-Res), and we have been proud to be in partnership with them for the past three years.



Rabbinic Reflections

But there is different kind of homelessness crying out to us these days that requires a greater level of personal commitment if we are going to respond. It is not something that everyone can do, but in every community there are people who can, and I am writing today in search of such people.

At present, there are Jewish children who cannot live in the homes of their parents. They must be removed, temporarily, from their homes for any number of reasons, including parental neglect or abuse.

These children are in desperate need of foster homes where they can find safe haven in a healthy and stable environment. While children in foster care may range from newborn to 16 years of age, there is a particular need right now for foster homes for children between two and six, and for teenage children.

There are simply not enough Jewish homes available in our communities at the present time to meet the needs of these Jewish children in crisis. Group homes and non-Jewish placements are being called upon to meet the immediate need, but we know that this is not the answer.

Jewish children in need ought to be placed in the care of loving families in Jewish homes. Anyone who loves children and can provide a loving home can be a foster parent. Couples with or without children, singles and single parents can be foster parents. There are both long-term and short-term placement needs. Successful candidates are provided with training and ongoing professional and financial support.

As we learn in the Talmud:

• "One who teaches another's child is as though they had given life to that child;" and

• "One who saves a single soul is as if they had saved the entire world."

Maybe you can be the one.

Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto has begun a campaign called One Shul, Two Homes, which aims to recruit new foster parents from among members of synagogues in the Greater Toronto Area.

If you think you might be able to make a difference in the life of a Jewish child in need by becoming a foster parent, please call Jewish Family & Child Service or the Jewish family service agency in your community.

March of Living organizers faced hard choices

By ELI RUBENSTEIN & RALPH LIPPER

Guest Voice

At this time, in a normal year, 350 Canadian Jewish teens, joined by about 60 adults, would be taking part in the March of the Living, which takes participants to sites of Nazi concentration camps in Poland and then to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Sadly, in light of current hostilities in the Middle East, no Canadian students will be visiting Israel in the coming weeks.

Less than 40 Canadian students will be attending the March of the Living for the Poland portion of the trip only, but most Canadian communities (including Toronto and Montreal) have decided not to take part in the March of the Living at all this year. On the international scene, most countries have chosen to visit Poland only (with a trip to Israel at a later date), although, as in Canada, different decisions are being made in local communities.

Since these decisions have been made public, much ink has been spilled in making harsh criticisms of one position or the other, sometimes using inflammatory language.

Some ask how Jewish organizations could cancel a trip to Israel at this time. Some wonder how other Jewish organizations could participate in the March of the Living without Israel. One writer referred to a trip without Israel as the "march of the dead" and argued that organizers had "failed miserably."

What was the background for each community's decision? Almost unanimously, trip leaders felt they could not take responsibility for participants' safety in Israel during this difficult period. The organizers made the decision with a great degree of sadness, but their primary concern was for the well-being of the students and the trip's future.

When considering the Poland-only option, a difference of opinion emerged in Jewish communities around the world, Canada included. There were those who felt the March of the Living, by definition, should not be held without a trip to Israel immediately after visiting Poland. Others felt that focusing only on the Shoah would give the wrong educational message and would also be emotionally difficult, since the trip would not have closure – that is, the hopeful and uplifting experience that Israel provides.

Furthermore, the symbolism of not going to Israel during its time of distress but still carrying on with the Poland part of the program was troubling for many. Organizations with a specifically Zionist mandate (such as the national sponsor of the March, UIA Federations Canada) had great difficulty in agreeing to cancel the main Zionist part of the program and continuing with only the Shoah element.

On the other side, some did not want to disappoint students who have been preparing for this program for six to 10 months, who have bonded with their accompanying survivors and each other, and who could still gain valuable educational messages from a Poland-only trip.

It was also noted that about 1,500 Israelis are expected to take part in the March of the Living regardless of decisions made in the Diaspora, and programs with Israelis, Righteous Gentiles and local Polish Jews could be organized during the visit to give the program more balance. Heavy penalties for cancelling bookings for the Poland portion of the program (airlines, hotels, kosher food, etc.) were additional considerations.

Two sayings from our tradition apply to this debate. The first is Derech eretz kadmah laTorah – civility is even more important than Torah. The second, made with reference to Talmudic debates, states Eilu va'eilu divrei Elokim chaim – these and these are the words of our living God. In other words, even positions diametrically opposed to each other may yet still share in the same search for truth.

Let us respect the decisions taken by each community on this difficult matter. And, even if we disagree with their positions, let us understand that like us, they too may share in aspects of the truth.

Eli Rubenstein is national director and Ralph Lipper is national chair of March of the Living Canada.

Buying Israeli on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israel's economy is hurting.

Between the world-wide meltdown of high-tech stocks and the huge decrease in the tourism industry, the country's retailers and exporters are looking for business.

The Internet gives you the opportunity to window shop and purchase some of Israel's best exports from almost anywhere in the world. (And if you are an investor, the web is an excellent first step for investigating business opportunities in Israel.)

Please note that shopping via the Internet can be quick, easy and enjoyable. But you should always take a few precautions. Any page asking for credit card or other private information should be "secure" – that is, it should have a web address that begins with http://. If you are still nervous about ordering through the Internet, try fax, phone or mail. Always note duty and shipping costs and the Web site's privacy and return policies. And if you still have any doubts, ask the business for references.

Don't be afraid to comparison shop, either. That same book or coin or CD may be offered by several online retailers at different prices.

Please note that I have not had commercial dealings with the Web sites mentioned in this column, so my mention of a site should not be interpreted as an endorsement.

Let's shop! In the real world, shopping means going to the mall. Things aren't very different online. These virtual malls are actually huge sites that carry many products from several retailers. At Israeli Wishes, you'll find an assortment of Elite chocolate, kosher spices and children's videos. And if you have someone special in Israel, you can send them flowers or a cheesecake [http://www.israeliwishes.com/_private/store/]. At the Judaica webstore, you can purchase etrog boxes, computer software and for a relaxing bath, Ahava Dead Sea products [http://www.judaicawebstore.com/].

If you are crazy about Israeli soccer, you can show your loyalty by sporting a Beitar Jerusalem knapsack available from the Israeli Scent Web site. But don't worry. They also carry Maccabi Tel Aviv and Hapoel Haifa souvenirs, too... plus a huge selection of books, videos and Judaica [http://www.israeliscent.com].

When you're done with the malls, don't forget to visit some of the smaller sites run by local businesses. The Farkash Gallery is a lovely art gallery located in the old city of Jaffa. In addition to works by Israeli artists, Farkash carries rare Judaica and wonderful old photographs of Israel. If you're not planning a trip to Jaffa in the near future, you can still marvel at their online exhibit of historic Israeli political, military and tourism posters. They'll will give a taste of Israel's early years that you'll never see in any history textbook [http://www.farkash-gallery.com/exihibitionPosterIndex.htm].

For more large and small retailers, check out the links at Maven Shopping and Gifts [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=204], Google [http://shlk.com/51] and Yahoo [http://shlk.com/52].

If you are considering investing in Israel, take a look at the Ministry of Industry and Trade's English language Web site [http://www.moit.gov.il/tamas_en.asp]. This large site has information about business development in Israel, the country's economy, research and development, the Israel Export Institute, and many ministry publications. Investors will also be interested in reading "Israel's Business Arena," the English on-line version of Israeli financial daily "Globes" [http:// www.globes.co.il].

And finally, let's visit one last mall. Israel Direct will sell you everything from handpainted ceramic tiles to goose liver paté [http://www.israeldirect.co.il/shop.htm]. But if you ever lived in Israel or if you are an Israeli living abroad, you'll appreciate their "Israeli Care Package." Who could say no to a gift package of Elite halvah, Osem Bomba Peanut Puffs, Za'atar spice, Telma falafel mix, Osem soup almonds and of course, half a kilo of chocolate spread?

Happy shopping.

How do we respond?

To my fellow Jews:

I sincerely hope this note finds you all well, safe and secure. Unfortunately, I know that it does not. Personally, I find myself struggling with childlike confusion at all that I see around me. I do not know which issue to begin to fight... there are suddenly so many.

Like you, I have sat in front of the television, watching the news stations and listening to the reports. As I have felt my anger rising, I have begun to understand that news reporters have turned into news commentators.

I have watched respected journalists bemoan the fact that Israelis are responding as Jews and not as Christians. In one instance, a Jewish newscaster asked a panel of theologians how the world can teach the Israelis to "turn the other cheek." Her subtle message became clear: if only the Jews of Israel could behave like Christians, the world would be spared this problem.

Do I respond to the anti-Semitic sentiment I heard from the Jewish newscaster? Do I yell bias? What do I do with this feeling of betrayal?

In the midst of the suicide bombings in Israel, a young Jewish child asked me why they just don't stop. I was silent for a long time as I realized I could not answer that question without teaching the child about hatred and racism and injustice. I chose not to "educate" that child. I don't have a lesson ready for those concepts. In defeat, I quietly responded, "I don't know."

Are we ready for what lies ahead? We are no strangers to conflict, but I fear we are strangers to its response. As Jews, we value all human life; it is not within us to cause needless suffering. Are we ready to stand loudly and proclaim that in this instance there is a need?

I stood at a rally recently in support of Israel. Several times during the event, the crowd sang prayers of peace and I found myself beginning to tear. There are too many issues, too many fronts to fight. Westerners are trying to separate anti-Israeli sentiments from anti-Semitic ones. We know that is not possible.

Do we split our focus? While rallying to support Israel, should we likewise be protesting outside European embassies demanding that they curb the anti-Semitic occurrences within their countries? Which Jew do I protect first?

To my fellow Jews: I sincerely hope this note finds you all well, safe and secure. Unfortunately, I know that it does not. We feel confused, angry, frustrated and betrayed. That is because we were not prepared. We momentarily forgot our own history. The midrash tells us that when Jacob was on his way to meet his brother Esau, a man who had sworn to kill him, Jacob sent a clear message: "If you are prepared for peace, I am with you; and if for war, I am ready for you."

With much love, Rachael Turkienicz.

Nadal JCC mourns death of Bill Emery

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bill Emery could shmooze with the best of them and talk tachliss – get down to brass tacks – when it came down to it.

He was often the first person you saw as you entered the front doors of the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre (JCC) at Spadina Avenue and Bloor Street, and chances are he'd know you by name and engage you in a casual conversation.

Obituary

For many, he was the public face of the JCC.

JCC members and staff were shocked to hear that Emery died of a massive heart attack late last month. He was only 45.

In his 14-year tenure at the JCC, Emery touched many hearts. He will be remembered for his ever-present smile, his dynamic, can-do attitude, his concern about others, his far-sighted approach to the centre's financial health and his devotion to the future well-being of the downtown Jewish community.

As executive-director, Emery helped steer the centre through trying times and was a strong advocate for its independence – since attained – when suggestions were floated a few years ago to sell it to pay off the debts of the larger Jewish community centre organization that it was part of at the time.

Conscious of the central role of the centre in the life of the downtown Jewish community, Emery fought for its continued existence and proudly pointed to the financial surplus the it was able to generate even while the larger organization teetered on the verge of bankruptcy.

Emery always pushed the vision of a vital JCC that would serve as the main "address" of the growing downtown Jewish community. He was also conscious of its role serving the broader community. He would not turn his back on local street people who would find a respite from the cold and a warm cup of coffee in the centre's lobby.

Charles Novogrodsky, president of the centre, said the board and its members "are in shock. He will be missed in every possible way. He was a deep practitioner of community development by getting people to participate in community organizations. He was an equitable boss, an empowerer of people and organizations."

Eleanor Levine, a fitness instructor at the JCC and a past board member, said: "What I loved about Bill was that he was always available, always willing to try new ideas. He was flexible and available to everyone in the community. He was passionate about the JCC. He loved it. We loved him for that."

Rabbi Ed Elkin of the First Narayever Congregation, remembered Emery as "the kind of person who very much cared about nurturing all kinds of different Jewish expression downtown. He was a big booster of a varied and vital Jewish community downtown with its own distinctive character within the wider Jewish community."

Bill Emery

Rabbi Elkin, who spoke at Emery's funeral, met Emery through their participation on the Downtown Jewish Community Council. It was almost a year after they began working together that someone casually mentioned to him that Emery wasn't Jewish.

"You could have knocked me over with a feather," he told mourners at Trinity St. Paul's United Church on April 5. "So closely did I identify him with the JCC and the council and all the myriad efforts to make the downtown Jewish community the best it could possibly be that it never occurred to me that he wasn't Jewish."

Emery exhibited a "generosity of spirit and the determination to help those in need."

What's more, he possessed "an extraordinarily personal, emotional connection with the fortunes of the community and an infectious confidence in its growth and success," Rabbi Elkin said.

Novogrodsky called Emery a "selfless individual. You don't meet many people like that."

Mark Sarner, past president of the JCC, remembered Emery as "the heart and soul of the JCC and the downtown Jewish community – really the cornerstone.

"He consistently did the right thing in the most selfless and ego-less manner, and the amazing thing about him is that from many small things, a big impact was made."

Sarner said it was tragic that Emery would not live to see the realization of his dream, the long-awaited redevelopment of the JCC that is currently under way.

Emery is survived by his wife, Maureen, and children Caitlin, 16, and Nolan, 6.

The centre has announced creation of the Miles Nadal JCC Bill Emery Family Trust Fund to benefit Emery's family. For more information, call 416-925-3755 ext. 24.

UJA campaign starts early due to Israel situation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is launching Campaign 2003 four months ahead of schedule and will hold an "Israel Emergency Sunday" telethon on April 28 to launch a week of campaigning by phone.

The efforts are part of a new $300-million North American emergency fund-raising campaign for Israel.

"We're moving [the start of the campaign] up because Israel needs it," said Ronnie Appleby, who is co-chairing the drive with Howard Sokolowski. Appleby said that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is requesting the help of Diaspora Jewry, as he did last summer, to support Israeli social programs that face reduced government funding because of money diverted to anti-terrorism efforts.

The new campaign is already under way. "We're going to ask people to dig as deep into their pockets and their hearts as they possibly can," said Appleby. "We're asking that people increase their gift by 50 per cent."

The overall campaign goal is $60 million, an increase of $10 million over last year.

All increases by donors above the amount they gave to last year's campaign will go directly to Israel. Of the remainder, about 40 per cent will go to the Jewish Agency for Israel, while the rest is used for local needs.

Any first-time donations will be treated as increases and will go directly to Israel.

"Their economy is so battered," Appleby said. "We have to help. We have a great need to help, and it's not just financial. It's political advocacy and moral support. A dozen Torontonians are there now [on a UJA Federation mission], and we're going to take as many missions as we can."

This year's Walk With Israel, on May 20, will also be part of the campaign, as is this week's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration at Earl Bales Park.

"It's unusual to move a campaign up, but it's not unprecedented," said Howard English, UJA Federation's director of communications. "We did it for the Yom Kippur War."

English said the federation receives approximately 25 calls and e-mails per day from people "almost pleading to do something on Israel's behalf. The decision to advance the campaign was based not only on the situation in Israel, but on strong community motivation."

In the first three days of last week alone, he said, $2 million was raised.

Canadian lawyers to investigate human rights in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A blue-ribbon collection of human rights lawyers, including former Ontario Premier Bob Rae, is set to embark on a fact-finding mission to Israel.

The lawyers will investigate the current state of human rights in Israel by meeting with members of the Israeli Knesset, advocacy groups, prosecuting attorneys, defence lawyers, judges and academics, said Ed Morgan, a human rights lawyer and law professor at the University of Toronto.

Morgan, who is organizing the trip, said the group will include Toronto lawyers Eddie Greenspan, Neil Finkelstein, John Rosen, Rae and perhaps others.

Bob Rae

"I wanted to take people who are known for human rights work and who have good, solid legal credentials, who are open-minded and who are not knee-jerk one way or the other when it comes to the Arab-Israeli situation," Morgan said.

Although neither the agenda nor the departure date was set at press time, Morgan said he hopes to arrange meetings with Israeli Chief Justice Aharon Barak as well as the country's justice minister, attorney general and opposition MKs, including those representing Arab constituents.

Morgan described the upcoming visit, which he expected to last only three or four days, to be "an investigative, fact-finding and educational mission."

In Canada, "we hear more of the criticisms of Israel than we do the Israeli side."

"My understanding of the Israeli legal and political system is that they have the same democratic and liberal values as our system. [Israel is] trying to comply with those values under tremendous pressure."

One issue that will likely be discussed is the controversy over Israel's decision to search Red Crescent ambulances before allowing them to proceed into battle zones. (Israel says the ambulances have been used to carry arms and fighters.) Another will be the issue of targeted killings of terrorism suspects and their leaders.

"We want to see how international lawyers approach that question," Morgan said.

Rae, who has visited Israel twice, once as premier of Ontario, said it is important to bring a balanced perspective to the mission – and to go with an open mind.

"I've long considered myself a strong friend of Israel, the Palestinians and a strong supporter of the peace process," Rae said.

"You can't watch [events] without a sense of tragedy."

Morgan said he decided to organize the trip after viewing New Democratic MP Svend Robinson's "grandstanding" performance at an Israeli military checkpoint, in which he cited human rights law as he tried to enter Ramallah.

In addition, Morgan said, the UN Human Rights Commission has dispatched Mary Robinson to investigate human rights in Israel. That move came after the commission passed a resolution in Geneva that "harshly condemned Israel as a violator of human rights.

"It seems like the decision was made and she will confirm it," Morgan said.

"The international community seems to have lost track of the fact that Israel is also a human rights-practicing country," he added.

Morgan, who serves as chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said the organization is not connected to the trip and all participants will pay their own way to Israel.

Popular Vaughan mayor remembered as a mensch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN, Ont. — The formalities at Lorna Jackson's funeral last week included addresses from Catholic, Muslim and Jewish clergy. Their presence, at Jackson's request, exemplified the multicultural aspect of the City of Vaughan, over which Jackson presided as mayor for 20 years until her death from cancer April 5. She was 66.

Obituary

In a series of tributes, Jackson was remembered for her personal attributes, her talent as an artist and her leadership in overseeing the growth of Vaughan from a town of 20,000 to a city of more than 200,000. The Jewish population of the city is estimated at 50,000.

Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation – which honoured Jackson with its first community leadership award in 1999 – had to be in New York at the time of the funeral, but in a tribute read as part of the service, he called Jackson a "real and genuine mensch... She radiated decency and goodness."

Perhaps her greatest achievement, said the rabbi, was "the magnificent tapestry of the landscape of this city," referring to the multicultural community she fostered.

Jackson, who was elected to Vaughan Council in 1974, served six years as a local councillor and two years as regional councillor before being elected mayor. She was elected for a seventh term of office in November 2000.

The mayor also served on York Regional Council, and chaired the York Region Police Services Board. She was a member of the Toronto and Region Conservation Authority for more than 14 years. Among her accomplishments, she successfully led a lobby to make face protection for children mandatory in recreational hockey in Ontario.

Lorna Jackson

Less than two months before her death, she led the effort to obtain commitments from the City of Toronto and the province of Ontario to close the Keele Valley Landfill Site by the end of this year.

"I was impressed by her humble manner," said Imam Naseem Mahdi of the Ahmadiyya Muslim Community Canada. "I found her to be a brave, compassionate and just leader."

City manager Scott Somerville noted that Jackson's "secret passion" was to read to young schoolchildren from Horton Hears a Who, her favorite book by Dr. Seuss. In the story, the mayor of Whoville believes that each person in a community is important and has something to contribute, he said. "This was vintage Lorna."

In a tearful tribute, her granddaughter Carolyn Shaw said she knows "exactly who the remarkable person is who shaped the person I am today, and the person I want to be tomorrow."

Jackson's professional commitment, said her granddaughter, included having a listed phone number "in case a concerned citizen needs to reach her at 9:30 p.m." She was successful not only as a politician, but as a wife, mother and grandmother, Shaw said.

Lorna, as she was known even to the schoolchildren she visited, was a friend to everybody, said officiating minister David Sherbino of Woodbridge Presbyterian Church.

She is survived by her husband of 45 years, Al; children Linda, Jim and Jeff, and three grandchildren.

Rabbi Employment Opportunity

Modern Sephardic Congregation in beautiful Portland, Oregon seeks a traditional and energetic Rabbi with knowledge of Sephardic Minhagim. Position is part-time or full-time. Congregation established in 1911 has Hazan, 70 member families and 30 associated families who wish to expand membership and programming. Sanctuary currently provides for separate seating for men and women, as well as a family seating section. Additional professional employment opportunities are available in the community to supplement income. Vibrant and safe city, with low cost of living, 30,000 Jewish population, with a wide range of institutions and agencies, including two Jewish day schools. Successful fund raising campaign underway to remodel Synagogue and fund education programs. Excellent flexible compensation package. HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE קהילת קדש

Executive Director

Turn vision into a plan of action

Holy Blossom Temple plays a vibrant role in the city's Jewish community and in the community at large. As the largest Reform congregation in Canada, and one of the most prominent synagogues in North America, Holy Blossom Temple has become internationally known as a forward-looking place of ideas and visionary leadership.

This opportunity is well suited to an organized, results-oriented professional who will embrace the Temple's evolving vision and act as the executive director during a period of dynamic change within the institution. An understanding of synagogue operations in the context of the Jewish community is essential, as are well developed financial, technological and security-management skills. Reporting to the volunteer President of the Temple and working in partnership with the Senior Rabbi, you will manage and operate the Temple's business, plus a growing endowment in its Foundation. This will entail developing and maintaining the systems, technology, policies and procedures required to monitor, analyse and report on the business. Drawing on your exceptional communication and listening talents, you will liaise with multiple stakeholders, and provide advice and support to the lay leadership of the Temple.

We thank all applicants in advance, but advise we will only contact those considered.

Israel urged to reform itself to make peace

By PABLO FUCHS
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Israelis and Palestinians who want peace must change their identity and learn to see the extremists, rather than the mainstream, on both sides as the enemy, says an Israeli scholar.

Emanuel Adler, who recently gave the inaugural lecture of the Charles and Andrea Bronfman Chair of Israeli Studies at the University of Toronto, says peace can only be established if both sides look within and try to change their ways before accusing each other of the escalation of violence.

"[The] Oslo [peace process] failed for many reasons, but the major one was that neither side tried to change itself and create a new identity," said Adler. "Both sides must understand that trying to change the other without changing yourself is fallacious."

Adler said peace with another people is unattainable if you cannot make peace with yourself first. Israel itself, he said, is torn between two identities: the general Tel Aviv mentality – modern, liberal and future-oriented – and the general Jerusalem mentality – nationalistic, partly Messianic and historical.

The Tel Aviv mentality, which represented the forward-moving and peace-oriented establishment of the 1990s, has since been replaced by the hard-liners of the Jerusalem mentality in mainstream Israeli thought, he said.

Since the hard-liners are only concerned with placing the blame on the other side, he said, it's necessary for Israelis to change their identity in order to believe in peace and move forward once again.

To do this, Adler proposed establishing a new Israeli identity based on three components: reforming the Jewish State, establishing a Mediterranean identity and creating a post-post-Zionist society.

First, he said, since Israel is the stronger side in the dispute and since it is a nation, it must reform itself through a promise to immediately withdraw from the territories with respect and dignity for the Palestinians in exchange for the Palestinian promise of dropping the coveted right of return and of recognizing Israel as a legitimate state. The compromise should not only be recognized by both parties, but must also be backed by the United Nations' Security Council, the United States and the European Union.

"The basis of this agreement must be to stop the violence at all costs and to understand that when Israelis use violence against the Palestinians, they will respond with violence against Israelis," said Adler.

Once this is done, the Jewish State can then begin its reformation, he said. Israel must remain free and democratic and recognize Israeli Arabs who wish to remain in Israeli territory as part of the majority. It must then add Arab symbols to the state and separate religion from the state, making Israel a Jewish, but pluralistic, state. A Palestinian state would also help sharpen the identity of those Israeli Arabs who currently feel isolated, he said.

Adler's second step in achieving a new Israeli identity was the establishment of a Mediterranean identity.

"Jews and Arabs don't have a shared identity of place," said Adler. "We see ourselves as belonging to the West and the Arabs see themselves as part of the Middle Eastern Arab world."

He said it's necessary for both parties to acknowledge they're part of the same regional Mediterranean group.

"This will begin to create a bridge between Jews and Arabs and help them understand they belong to the same cultural region," Adler said. "At the same time, this will help build bridges between the Islamic world and the western world and this change of identity needs to start now."

The final part of the equation, Adler said, is to create a post-post-Zionist society. Instead of post-Zionism, the idea that it's necessary to dismantle Zionism and create a binational state, the goal of a post-post-Zionist society would be to make peace.

"Zionism needs to be given new meaning," he explained. "It needs to be given new meaning to Jews around the world, who would then come to Israel to make peace."

Both parties must view the land as serving the people and life, not as the people and life serving the land, Adler said. At the same time, Israel must redistribute its wealth and and seek Diaspora Jews' best ideas for peace.

"The tragedy of the whole situation is that the Palestinians have been hijacked by the refugees and the Israelis have been hijacked by the settlers," said Adler. "It's time to come to a compromise and accept that this is both our land and your land. The cycle of violence is continuing for the main reason that the two peoples have not reconciled themselves with each other's existence."

Canada praised for opposing UN Mideast mission

They point to a vote on April 5 in which Canada was not only one of just two countries to oppose sending a UN-sponsored "fact-finding" mission to the Palestinian territories, but was the sole nation to call for a recorded vote on the measure.

The Islamic-sponsored resolution to send an urgent observer mission to the area passed anyway. The final tally was 44 in favour, seven abstentions and two opposed (Canada and [illegible] vote was seen as a surprising boost for Israel.

Canada cited "serious concerns" about the nature of an observer mission, and did "not feel that the resolution accurately reflects the full context of the current situation," stated Marie Gervais-Vidricaire, head of Canada's delegation at the commission. "We are also not convinced of the utility of such a mission to the search for peace or that it would make a positive contribution to current efforts to secure a meaningful ceasefire."

That prompted Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to send Graham a letter applauding Canada's stance, saying it is pleased this country seems to be honouring a commitment to work with Israel, made prior to the UN session.

Before the six-week UN session got under way, Graham held talks with Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's deputy foreign minister, who asked that Canada "be our voice" in Geneva. Israel has only observer status at the UNCHR, as does the United States, which lost its seat on the commission last year.

(Rabbi Melchior is scheduled to be the guest speaker at a rally for Israel, scheduled for this Sunday in Ottawa.)

Canada's UN record on votes affecting Israel since last summer's anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, "has yielded some good results," CJC president Keith Landy acknowledged to The CJN.

The CIC's David Goldberg agreed, especially when it came to the vote on sending the UN observer mission. "It does appear clear and obvious that Canada is playing a much more vigorous role in using [its] moral suasion to demand a vote. Canada pushed the issue."

Even so, the commission voted to send Mary Robinson, the UN high commissioner for human rights, on the immediate fact-finding mission to the West Bank.

> 'Serious concerns' cited

Canada's explanation of its vote noted that the situation in the Palestinian territories is extremely dangerous. Canada also said it has "repeatedly" stated that in order for third-party monitoring to be effective, it must be accepted by both parties. "It is not clear that the principal parties would accept any such mission."

The CIC took note of three other resolutions before the UNCHR. In one, Canada voted for a call to establish an independent Palestinian state.

"That didn't surprise us," said Goldberg. "Canada has always supported [Palestinian] statehood."

Canada abstained on a measure condemning Israeli actions in the "occupied Syrian Golan." While that didn't surprise the CIC either, Canada's explanation of its vote was notable.

Canada said it abstained and called for a roll call vote, because the resolution "did not provide a full and balanced assessment of the situation in the region."

Goldberg sees that and other Canadian stands as small but sure changes in how this country votes at UN bodies on matters targeting Israel.

"We have very little to complain about. To the contrary, the Canadians, the Israelis and the Americans seem to be consulting. Overall, we're pleased with Canada's position. I would [illegible] it's a kind of mini-breakthrough."

On a third resolution, Canada voted to express "concern at continuing Israeli settlement activities" and to have Israel reverse its settlement policy. Goldberg said that when it comes to Jewish settlements, Canada has been "consistently wrong, but at least consistent."

Other signs that Canada's stance may be shifting favourably toward Israel are seen in the language being used by Graham and other officials, Goldberg noted.

"There's been a slight change in the language. No one's using terms like 'moral equivalence' or 'cycle of violence.'"

As well, Canada's philosophy on the plight of Palestinian refugees may also be undergoing a change. Ottawa, Goldberg pointed out, is moving away from citing UN Resolution 194 of 1948, which calls for the return to Israel of displaced Palestinians, and is now relying more frequently on resolutions 242 of 1967 and 338 of 1973, which do not speak about Palestinian refugees' right of return.

"That's not insignificant," Goldberg stated. "It could signal a slight shift in policy."

Monday's meeting with Graham was to be "proper, cordial and exploratory," said participant Joseph Wilder, national chair of the CIC.

It was also to offer the opportunity for the community to express "appreciation" for Canada's opposition to the vote on sending the UN mission. Canada, Wilder said, "has done well by Israel."

The resolution, sponsored by Islamic nations, condemned the "frightening increase in the loss of life, the invasion of Palestinian cities and villages, [and] the arrest and detention of Palestinians." It also slammed Israel's "disproportionate and indiscriminate use of military force against the people of Palestine and its leadership."

NDP MP Svend Robinson, who made an unsuccessful bid to visit Yasser Arafat at his besieged Ramallah headquarters earlier this month, said he was "ashamed and appalled" that Canada voted against the measure.

Last Friday, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan endorsed the idea of dispatching military force to the region. Addressing the UNCHR, Annan said he seeks a "force that will help create a secure environment, to allow for [humanitarian] assistance, to allow us to be able to end the killing and give us time for negotiations and diplomacy."

Graham told the House of Commons that Canada would consider participating in such a force. And Prime Minister Jean Chrétien said during his trip to Africa that Canada "will want to be there" if the UN authorizes any such move.

Community officials scheduled to meet with Graham included those from the CIC, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Zionist Federation and B'nai Brith Canada.

Canadian played pivotal role in Israel's creation

It is now forgotten that the UNSCOP deliberations on partition were contentious, even acrimonious at times, with a two-state solution far from the only option on the table. When UNSCOP first met in the summer of 1947, with barely a three-month deadline in which to report, the weight of opinion on the committee favoured creation of a single Palestinian-controlled state.

It was only through the [illegible] and persuasiveness of Ivan Rand, the Canadian participant on the committee, that the majority came to accept the partition solution.

At least that's the view of Hamilton lawyer John Ross, whose research has uncovered Rand's pivotal role in the history of the time. By blind luck, Ross discovered a box of archival material, marked "Palestine," in the law library at the University of Western Ontario, the school Rand established following a distinguished career as a judge on the Supreme Court of Canada.

Based on his research with archival documents, Ross believes Rand deserves much of the credit for the diplomatic and political maneuvering that led to the creation of Israel. "Rand was the workhorse, doing the drafting and writing the report," he asserts.

Even within a week of the report's Sept. 1 deadline, most of the 11 UNSCOP members leaned towards a single state. "In the last five days, they gradually coalesced to Rand's position. He knew how to work consensus because he was a good judge," Ross said.

Rand, who served on the High Court from 1943-59 and developed a reputation for judgements that favoured the underdog, sought out common ground among UNSCOP members. He constantly encouraged them to put aside the positions of their home countries and consider themselves working solely for the UN. He reminded them the report had to be consistent with earlier diplomatic declarations, including the historic Balfour Declaration (which recognized the Jewish right to a national home in Palestine). He defused "acrimonious personal attacks" among UNSCOP members and he persuaded the delegates to be fair and neutral when addressing supercharged emotional issues.

"He was viewed as a moral, neutral, impartial person while in Palestine [on fact-finding missions]," Ross said. "He had instant credibility so when the report was written, it was seen as neutral and even-handed."

Considering Canada's position at the time, that was quite an accomplishment, Ross noted.

At the time, Canada straddled the diplomatic fence, trying to find a comfortable position between the British desire to see their de facto control over Palestine continue, [illegible] of continued partnership of a unitary state, and the position of the United States, which wanted to increase its influence and which wanted Canada to back its position.

Canada was reluctant to get involved, but when push came to shove, the government agreed to send a representative to UNSCOP. Rand, who had developed a scrupulous reputation for fairness, was selected after the government announced it would give no formal instructions to its delegate.

Nevertheless, Canada's Foreign Affairs department tried to influence Rand into accepting its pro-Arab view, Ross said. It presented him with briefing papers that opposed partition and drew a moral equivalence between the Jewish and Arab experiences.

That particular point rankles Ross, since the briefing notes compared the suffering and annihilation of the Jews in the Holocaust to the destruction of Baghdad – by Mongol invaders in 1258.

"This is ridiculous," said Ross. "It's unbelievable the extent to which External Affairs went to convince Rand to support the British."

Rand, however, was an independent thinker. He and the committee members toured mandatory Palestine, heard representations and met with people on the ground.

As the report deadline approached, Rand helped change the views of the Swedish, Uruguayan, Dutch, Czech and Peruvian delegates. With the support of members from the Netherlands and Guatemala (which favoured a Jewish state from the outset), the committee voted for partition. India, Iran and Yugoslavia voted against while Australia abstained.

When the United Nations went on to discuss the future of the region, it only considered the majority report in favour of partition. The partition proposal helped sway world opinion towards the idea of a Jewish state alongside a Palestinian state and when the vote came in November 1947, even Canada voted in favour.

Canada would have looked "ridiculous" voting against the international tide and against a recommendation endorsed by its own UNSCOP representative, Ross said.

"It is important that people know what [Rand] did. This is the greatest achievement by a Canadian for the State of Israel. He put the interests of the Jewish people ahead of the financial interests of the British empire."

Jorge Garcia Granados, the Guatemalan representative on UNSCOP, went on to serve as his country's first ambassador to Israel. Two years ago, a street in his name was dedicated in Israel.

Ross believes no less an honour should be bestowed on Rand, who died in 1969 and whose part in the creation of Israel cannot be underestimated.

And Canadian youngsters ought to know about Rand's important role. At a time when Canada seems to regularly line up at the United Nations to criticize the Jewish state, they should know that there once was a genuine Canadian hero they can feel proud of, Ross said.

Black student faces campus anti-Semitism

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Dalton Wells

TORONTO — These days, Dalton Wells tends to carry his kippah in his pocket when he's on the York University campus.

About a year ago, he was attacked in the parking lot after two young men confronted him about his kippah and asked him if he was Jewish.

Wells, 25, said he reported the incident to the York security at that time, but didn't officially file a complaint because he just wanted to put the matter behind him.

"I experience more racism [here] as a Jew than as a black person," Wells said in an interview.

"It's still politically correct to hassle Jews," Wells noted, adding that Jews seem to be the last ethnic group that it's OK to persecute.

Wells, who was one of the organizers of the Queen's Park rally in support of Israel April 7, said, "It generally takes people by surprise when they realize I'm Jewish."

And although he experiences anti-Semitism in Toronto, nothing compares to what he is told his grandmother experienced in Algeria.

According to family stories, his family moved to North Africa after the destruction of the First Temple, Wells said.

The family called themselves the Kahinnah and intermarried to some extent with the Berbers, the indigenous peoples of North Africa, Wells said.

After the Islamic invasion in the 600s, the family moved southward and became traders in the Sahara Desert, Wells explained, adding that they finally immigrated to the United Kingdom after the European colonization of the Middle East in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Because they could read and write in Hebrew, they were relatively educated, and that gave the family an advantage over the other potential immigrants at that time, Wells said.

Wells, who grew up in England, moved to Toronto in 1994 after receiving a scholarship to study at York University. He is now doing a graduate degree in clinical psychology and knows of six other members of the black Jewish community on the York campus.

"Each story is a little different," Wells said. But "it's always a surprise and a pleasure when I meet a black Jew."

Montreal cancels entire March of the Living

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Local organizers of the March of the Living cancelled the entire trip less than a week before students were to leave for Poland and Israel, abandoning a plan that would have made Montreal one of the few communities in the world determined to go ahead with a trip to both countries.

After the suicide bombing at a Passover seder in Netanya, organizers decided not to go ahead with the trip, which was to have taken place this month, said local march coordinator Ruth Najman.

She said the trip's organizer, FEDERATION CJA's Bronfman Israel Experience Centre (BIEC), made the decision with safety concerns in mind and not because of lack of interest.

Nearly 60 Grade 11 students were registered for the educational trip when the decision was made to cancel. Over 20 students had already withdrawn.

"The parents were very supportive. They felt we made the right decision," Najman said.

The BIEC had set a minimum of 20 participants for the annual journey, which takes Jewish teens to the sites of Nazi concentration camps in Poland and then to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

The plan is to take the same group of almost 60 students, who will be in CEGEP next year, to Poland and Israel during their winter break, Najman said.

The students have already spent many hours preparing, and a continuing program will be designed for them between now and December, she said.

No other students will be accepted for the postponed trip, but the BIEC will organize a regular March of the Living for April 2003, Najman said.

On March 15, Montreal community leaders announced they would neither comply with the international March of the Living organization's decision to cancel the Israel portion of the two-week trip, nor cancel the whole program, as did some communities, including Toronto. At that point, the BIEC believed it could ensure students' safety.

Najman said the Montreal organizers felt the trip's culmination in Israel is "an integral part" of the March of the Living experience.

"A trip to Poland alone is good for an education in prewar Jewish life and the Holocaust, but the March is more than that," she said.

"The Montreal organizers believe that the March is a journey through the history of European Jewry from destruction to rebirth of the Jewish people in the Land of Israel."

Without the optimistic conclusion in Israel, they believed the students would have "an incomplete view and an unbalanced educational experience," Najman said.

The BIEC had drawn up a shortened and modified Israel portion that would have focused on the Negev and the area around Masada and would have included a short visit to the Western Wall in Jerusalem, if security permitted.

Najman said the BIEC had "reluctantly" agreed to allow participants to return to Montreal directly from Poland if they chose to.

Aside from a 20-student minimum for the full trip, the BIEC had said it would proceed with the march if its Israeli counterpart gave it security clearance and if there was no Canadian advisory against travel in Israel.

Montreal is an annual participant in the march and numbers have increased steadily over the years: between 1999 and 2001, the community sent about 110 students each year, Najman said.

GRANITE PEAK HOMES

An Open Letter To Our Jewish Community

ראש הממשלה
Prime Minister

April 7, 2002
כ״ה ניסן, תשס״ב

Dear Friends,

Since September 2000, Israel has contended with an unprecedented wave of terrorist violence instigated by the Palestinians. All our restraint, significant compromises and efforts to achieve peace have been rewarded with only terror and bloodshed.

In the wake of the brutal acts over Passover, the Government of Israel embarked on an operation to restore security to our citizens. This is a battle for our homes, values and way of life. Although the struggle will be long and difficult, it is only through defeating terror that we will be able to reach a ceasefire and promote reconciliation.

The population and economy of Israel have suffered as a consequence of this continuing crisis. Tourism has declined sharply, unemployment is rising and government funds are being redirected from social programs to defense.

Today, we need you more than ever. I call upon you, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to publicly express your solidarity with Israel and to mobilize your full passion and resources for the sake of strengthening your United Israel Appeal campaigns. Since support for aliyah must continue, especially at times like these, my government has recognized the essential need to work together with United Israel Appeal, United Jewish Communities and the Jewish Agency, in order to facilitate the adoption of a minimum of 20,000 Jews from Argentina over the next three years.

Throughout the history of the State of Israel, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the United Israel Appeal family have always risen to the challenge – responding to our enemies by raising funds to strengthen the State of Israel, whether to rescue Jews from countries of distress and support their absorption or develop Israel's social and educational infrastructure.

These are difficult times for the State of Israel, but the Jewish people have seen harder times. As in the past, I am certain that, together, determined and confident in the justice of our cause, we will prevail and triumph, achieving peace and security for us, our neighbours and future generations.

Sincerely,

Ariel Sharon

Ariel Sharon

Now. More than ever.

Now more than ever Israel needs us.

Now, when Israel faces some of its darkest days since Independence, 54 years ago.

Israel is no longer facing a crisis. She's facing an emergency. Social services are strained to the limit. The government has transferred more than $2 billion from other services to escalating security expenses. The cost to the Israeli economy of relentless terror is an estimated $4 billion.

That's why we've taken the extraordinary decision to begin UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 now, four months ahead of schedule.

Your gift increase to Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 will be designated directly for social service programs in Israel on behalf of the vulnerable, including victims of terror.

The long-term damage to Israel, her economy and her social structure will take years to repair. But we can start now. And our community can provide hope for the people of Israel.

If not now, when?

Miles Nadal JCC

In honour of the memory of Miles Nadal JCC Executive Director, Bill Emery, the Board of Directors is announcing the establishment of:

The Miles Nadal JCC Bill Emery Family Trust Fund

Bill Emery's work in the JCC directly and indirectly added to the lives of thousands in Toronto's Jewish community and the JCC's downtown Toronto community.

Loved and respected by family, friends and peers, Bill will also be sorely missed by the staff who worked with him. Bill was widely recognized as an outstanding, professional community leader.

Bill was deeply connected to our members and community. He knew our names; he attended personally to our needs and concerns.

Bill's vision and drive led to great advances at our JCC. Our ever-developing facility, programs and services is owing to his leadership.

The Miles Nadal JCC Bill Emery Family Trust Fund will benefit Bill's family.

All gifts will be processed through the Miles Nadal JCC donations office: 416.925.3755 x22

MPs debate Mideast crisis

The following are excerpts, taken from Hansard, of last Tuesday's emergency House of Commons debate on the Middle East crisis. The session ended at 2:45 a.m. the following morning.

Mr. John Reynolds: (Leader of the Opposition, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, it is still not clear that the government is doing anything sensible to bring peace and security to the Middle East. It is clear that Syria and Iraq are in fact stirring up as much trouble as they can, either inside or near Israel and the Palestinian Authority, to suit their own needs. If these two troublemaker regimes were brought to heel, both the Palestinians and Israelis would be safer.

Could the minister of foreign affairs explain why Canada has not put any pressure on Syria or Iraq to back away from supporting organizations or others who are waging a war of terror in this region?

Hon. Bill Graham (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and the House that the government has been in regular contact with all governments in the Middle East and is urging restraint on all governments.

We are perfectly aware that this violent conflict has the possibility of spinning out into other areas. We agree with all members of the House that we as Canadians must do our part to make sure that it does not. That is why we urge respect of the [UN] Security Council resolution to cease the hostilities, cease the fighting and bring the parties back to the bargaining table.

Mr. John Reynolds: Yesterday we asked if Canada was supporting President [George W.] Bush's efforts to have the Israelis withdraw from the territories. President Bush has also demanded at the same time that Yasser Arafat denounce terrorism as a tactic.

Canada has some clout with Arafat and the Palestinian Authority. I would ask the foreign affairs minister to tell Canadians if we are using any of that clout to persuade Chairman Arafat to denounce terrorism as President Bush has requested.

Hon. Bill Graham: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the hon. member, but he has been here in the House and has heard the answers that the government has consistently given on this question. We have consistently stated to Chairman Arafat that all violence has to stop, that they must cease encouraging violence. We have been consistent with that. We spoke to the speaker of the Palestinian Authority when he was visiting the House and gave him that message.

I have passed on that message to my counterparts in the Middle East. We have consistently said to stop the terrorism, that it is not getting them anywhere and that they also must do their best to stop the violence. I assure the member that we will continue--

The Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Rahim Jaffer (Edmonton-Strathcona, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, it is wrong that the government is allowing Hezbollah to raise money in Canada. Yesterday the minister of foreign affairs stated:

There is a dimension of Hezbollah that actually has representatives elected to the Lebanese House... We will continue to work with all parties with whom we can get peace. We will continue to do that.

Is the minister saying that because Hezbollah has members in the Lebanese parliament and does some charity work it is therefore not a terrorist organization and its fundraising operations should not be banned in Canada?

Hon. Bill Graham: Mr. Speaker, I think we have made it clear. This question has been asked before in the House. It is very clear that Hezbollah's military arm and any activities that it is conducting in Canada which have [illegible] to do with raising money for military activities are totally banned and repressed by the government.

There are, however, activities by Hezbollah which are of a social nature, and there are 12 members of the Lebanese legislature elected by Hezbollah to the legislature, and we are not going to declare them terrorists and stop dialogue with them in our efforts to get peace.

Mr. Rahim Jaffer: Mr. Speaker, these are very fine lines. Let us be clear on who we are talking about. In 1983, Hezbollah blew up the U.S. marine and French army barracks in Beirut. It blew up the U.S. Embassy annex in Beirut in 1984. It attacked the Israeli Embassy in Lebanon in 1992. It continues to attack Israeli settlements.

Canada claims to be standing shoulder to shoulder with the United States in the war on terrorism. The United States has banned fundraising by all branches of Hezbollah. Why has Canada only banned the military wing?

Hon. Bill Graham: Mr. Speaker, we are also standing side by side with our colleagues in the United Kingdom who have adopted exactly the same stance that we have. The members of the United Kingdom are aware from the Irish experience that there is a difference between Sinn Fein and the IRA and that if we want peace we must deal with those who have a political dialogue. That is what we want. We do not want to just point fingers. We want peace. That is what we do in all our policies.

Ms. Alexa McDonough (Halifax, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to question the foreign affairs minister. Canadians are beginning to wonder whether the government is committed to doing anything concrete to advance peace in the Middle East.

As part of creating the conditions for peace, both sides deserve to know what specific help members of the international community are ready to offer.

My question is this: Will the government state clearly today its readiness to commit troops when it is appropriate as part of a peacekeeping effort in the Middle East?

Hon. Art Eggleton (Minister of National Defence, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think as the foreign affairs minister has indicated, it is premature, but if there comes a circumstance where that is appropriate, I think the prime minister and others in this government have said in the past that of course Canada would look at that matter very carefully, but it is a premature question at this point in time.

Ms. Alexa McDonough: Mr. Speaker, I would again like to direct my question to the foreign affairs minister, whose favourite response to questions about what this government is prepared to do to advance peace in the Middle East is to say that Canada supports the U.S. position. Today Secretary of State Colin Powell has stated that the United States is prepared to put U.S. observers on the ground as part of a truce settlement.

Will the foreign affairs minister publicly state today that we will at the very least commit to sending Canadians to join an international team of observers, a monitoring team, in the Middle East?

Hon. Bill Graham: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question, but this government has consistently stated that if the time becomes opportune and if the parties are willing to accept it, we are prepared to participate in putting monitors in place to help move the peace process. We are willing to consider all possibilities, but as I said yesterday when asked, it is premature at this particular time because the parties themselves are not in that position.

We would certainly support, and I have said publicly that we are supporting, the efforts of Mr. Powell. I am confident that our European allies also will support that. We would definitely look at putting monitors in place when the time is appropriate and it is possible.

Mr. Irwin Cotler (Mount Royal, Lib.): It is not the Israeli occupation that has been the root cause of the conflict; rather, it is the rejection of Israel, even at the price of rejecting thereby a Palestinian state, that led to the initial occupation in 1967 and still sustains the less than five per cent of the territory yet occupied by Israel as a result of the Six Day War. In a word, over 95 per cent of the territory captured by Israel in the exercise of self-defence in the Six Day War has been returned within the framework of peace treaties with countries that were prepared to recognize Israel and, in the initial stages of Oslo, which have given Arafat control over 98 per cent of the Palestinian people.

However, in the year 2000 in the Camp David talks and then again in Taba, Arafat rejected a Clinton and Israeli initiated proposal that would have ended what remained of the occupation and would have established an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza with east Jerusalem as its capital. This would have given the Palestinians almost everything that they themselves had been asking for, save for the right of return which, as Palestinian leader Sari Nusseibah put it, would have meant a second Palestinian state in place of Israel.

This would have required of Arafat and the Arab world to finally accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state in the Middle East alongside the 22 Arab states in the region. Arafat not only rejected this proposal, which recalls the refrain that the Palestinians never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity, but as the Arab scholar Fouad Ajami recently put it, Arafat launched a war of terror in the heartland of Israel of which the recent Passover massacre was a real life metaphor.

Judy Feld Carr to receive award

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 28 years, Judy Feld Carr ran a clandestine network that brought most of the Jews of Syria from captivity to freedom.

More than 3,000 men, women and children were rescued from the grips of the Assad regime thanks to her efforts. Today they live freely in New York, Israel and elsewhere in the world.

Today, Feld Carr's exploits are well-documented, though for years she carried on her work in secret, fearing for the well-being of the Syrian Jewish community as well as for her own personal safety.

On June 5, Feld Carr will be honoured for her devotion to human rights and for her work assisting others in need. Feld Carr will be the first Canadian to receive the Wiesenthal Award for Tolerance, Justice and Human Rights at a cocktail reception and evening of entertainment at Toronto's Performing Arts Centre in North York.

True to its origins in Los Angeles, the Simon Wiesenthal Center is lining up an evening's entertainment that promises to include a taste of Hollywood. Actor Jon Voight will serve as keynote speaker while Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Los Angeles-based centre, will also address the audience. World-renowned cellist Ofra Harnoy will provide the musical entertainment.

Also on tap for the evening are a documentary film prepared by Israel-based TV journalist Martin Himel, who has interviewed some of the Syrian Jews rescued by Feld Carr. Local artist Al Green has sculpted a piece titled "People Helping People," which features two clasped hands, that will be presented to Feld Carr.

Organizers are expecting as many as 1,000 people at the tribute event, said Avi Benlolo, national director of development for the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

"The essence of the award is to honour Judy," he said. We want to exemplify Canadians who have done something wonderful and extraordinary to help people.

"It is important to put people like her on a pedestal and say, you can be like this too."

In addition to honouring Feld Carr, the program is also designed to raise funds for the centre's Canadian branch, boost the organization's profile and inspire young people, Benlolo said.

Known originally for its work in exposing Nazi war criminals, the Simon Wiesenthal Center now also organizes adult education programs, trains police officers to be sensitive to religious and ethnic tolerance, monitors the rise of hatred and anti-Semitism and produces educational films on Israel and the Holocaust (it has twice won Academy Awards for Best Documentary).

The Center is also known for its Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles, which educates thousands of people a year on tolerance and the Holocaust. There are plans for similar facilities in New York and Jerusalem.

What's right... what's wrong

Several items this week:

1. Powerful, morally-charged words from Rosie DiManno of the Toronto Star (April 3):

"This is surely the most ignoble moment in the recent history of the Palestinian cause. And the most regrettable moment for Canada to weigh in with an intemperate attack on Israel for responding with force to the ceaseless murder, the shredding, of its innocent civilians…

"Yet the global outrage regarding at least 44 Israeli civilians killed in Palestinian attacks since last [week]… has been eclipsed by a far louder chorus of condemnation for Israel's tactics in defending itself against an enemy that will not be placated…"

The key issue for DiManno – the near apoplectic fury of much of the world at Israel's daring to defend itself by doing what any other nation in similar circumstances would do, far earlier and almost certainly with more brutal force – demands an explanation. The world's historical inability to treat Jews with equanimity requires not simply political scientists but an entire panel of experts: historians, cultural anthropologists, theologians and even a few psychiatrists devoted to the study of social pathology.

2. Where are the editorials denouncing the Hezbollah attacks on Israel's northern border? Where is the criticism of Syria and Iran for trying to provoke Israel into a wider war by heating things up in the north?

In May 2000, Israel withdrew its soldiers from its security zone in southern Lebanon to what the UN certified was its northern border, thus fully complying with UN Security Council Resolution 425. An area Israel holds near that border, Har Dov, which Hezbollah keeps attacking under the pretext that it belongs to Lebanon, is actually part of the Golan Heights and is claimed by Syria.

Long ago, Hezbollah lost any international legitimacy to wage a "national liberation" struggle against Israel. But it continues to fire across the border and even to fire upon planes in Israeli airspace in the north. The international community, not unexpectedly, is almost entirely silent about these violent provocations, about Syria and Iran's roles and Lebanon's reckless response.

British journalists such as Robert Fisk and David Hirst, who have made careers bashing Israel at every turn – they formerly insisted that Israel had been in Lebanon to grab land and water resources – pay no heed to Arab violations on the Lebanese-Israeli border, but we do expect better from many of our own journalists and editorial writers.

3. Reflections on the media in general:

Say it isn't so, John:

"As a newspaper columnist, I'm acutely aware that the first obligation of my trade is to be interesting, not to be right." – John R. MacArthur, publisher of Harper's Magazine, in "Down with St. George," Globe and Mail, March 30).

Opinion: 3/27 & 9/11

By JEFF ROSEN
News & Internet Editor

Three twenty-seven… 3/27… 3-27. No matter how many times you say it or how many different ways you write it, it never seems to roll off the tip of your tongue like 9/11. Unfortunately for Israel and Jewish people around the world, the events connected to these two dates do not mean the same thing and 3/27 will not be remembered as long.

On that date just last month, a suicide bomber walked into a hotel in Netanya and forever changed the lives of a group of Jewish people gathered for a seder, killing over 25 people and injuring many more. Can you imagine one of our most sacred holidays being desecrated in such a manner? And what is the world's response a month later? Israel must show restraint. Israel! Can you imagine that?

I guess Israel lacks the sense of dramatic flair that the Americans are famous for. While the terrorist attack on the World Trade Center towers was a horrific act and something that definitely should be remembered for all time, the fact remains that the American system in general and President George W. Bush in particular have helped to enshrine the date of those attacks in the memory of people everywhere.

Unfortunately, Israelis and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lack the same flair. An alternative explanation is that while terrorist acts on U.S. soil are a random occurrence, Israelis and the rest of the world have grown accustomed to madmen blowing themselves up in the Middle East. While Israel has made a number of mistakes in handling the current conflict, Canada and the rest of the world continue to impose a double standard on the only democratic country in the Middle East.

Consider these similarities:

1. Public institutions are attacked in broad daylight, resulting in massive loss of life and destruction of property.
2. The attacked country vows to combat terrorism until it is vanquished and retaliates with full force, resulting in loss of innocent life in its attempt to crush its enemies.

Also significant and very similar are remarks by the leaders involved in the terrorist strikes:

1. "We do not differentiate between those dressed in military uniforms and civilians; they are all targets in this fatwa." –Osama bin Laden.
2. "Even if one Israeli dies for every 10 Palestinians, then the three million Palestinians can kill 300,000 Israelis." –Dr. Mahmoud al-Zahar, a leading member of Hamas.

There have been some important differences though. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien boldly stated after the attacks in New York and Washington: "Together with our allies we will defy and defeat the threat that terrorism poses to all civilized nations."

However, when he finally decided to speak out against the violence in Israel, his tone was remarkably different. He said Israel "should respect the resolutions of the United Nations that have asked the tanks to go back on the other side of the border and start a dialogue, because the violence will lead nowhere."

Our prime minister's two statements appear contradictory. He calls for Israel to stop defending itself against people who seek to destroy it, yet a half-year earlier he announced that Canada would fight against terrorism wherever it occurs.

I agree with the esteemed Liberal leader when he said that "violence will get us nowhere." Unfortunately, not everyone shares his sentiments. Even if one were to give Yasser Arafat the benefit of the doubt about his supposedly peaceful intentions, rival Palestinian groups have clearly outlined their objectives. Peace and a two-nation solution are not part of their objectives.

On April 4, the Toronto Star ran an interview with leaders of Hamas. It was quite disgusting in one respect, but illuminating in another. Let the world see what Israel is really up against:

"Our equation does not focus on a ceasefire; our equation focuses on an end to the occupation," stated Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas.

According to the Star, Hamas wants Israeli withdrawal from all of the West Bank and Gaza, the dismantling of settlements and full right of return for the four million Palestinians who live in other states. After that, the Jews could remain, living "in an Islamic state with Islamic law," said al-Zahar. "From our ideological point of view, it is not allowed to recognize that Israel controls one square metre of historical Palestine."

"There are a lot of open areas in the United States that could absorb the Jews," added Ismail Abu Shanab, one of the organization's leaders.

For these reasons alone, Israel must continue to defy world opinion and strike out against its enemies. One can only hope that world leaders will finally wake up and come to their senses before these so-called Palestinian leaders, these madmen fulfil their vision.

Atlantic Canada Jews gather for Yom Hashoah

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — "I'm still alive. I don't know if I will be tomorrow" – words of a Warsaw Ghetto resident written shortly before his death in the uprising, discovered years later in the 1950s.

The passage was read by high school student Sarah Zatzman of Halifax at this year's Yom Hashoah ceremony in her community. It was in keeping with the Atlantic Jewish Council's theme for Yom Hashoah 2002, Their Last Voice: Letters and Testaments from Jews in the Holocaust, expressed in many Eastern Canadian communities during memorial services over the past two weeks.

In Fredericton, N.B., more than 250 people at Sgoolai Israel Synagogue heard Judy Weissenberg Cohen of Toronto, a survivor of the Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen camps, speak about the extra horrors women faced as they entered the extermination camps.

She told the audience, which event chair and survivor Israel Unger said was more than 80 per cent non-Jewish, that younger women with babies were immediately and surreptitiously told by camp inmates to give their children to their children's grandmothers.

"Women under 14 and over 45 were being sent immediately to the gas chambers, while those between were spared," Cohen said. "If the young mother had a child, they too went to the chambers. A woman without children might be given extra time to live. But most mothers couldn't give up their children."

Unger, a Fredericton resident since 1966 and dean emeritus in chemistry at the University of New Brunswick, is also co-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Holocaust commemoration committee.

"We usually attract a large number of gentiles to this event through the intercity clergy council and information sent to legions and other community groups," he said. "We also had the lieutenant governor, mayor and federal and provincial legislators in attendance."

Members of the Jewish community, as well as a legionnaire and Canon Philip Ward, an Anglican cleric, lit commemorative candles.

"I've been at most services in Atlantic Canada through the years and I'm proud of the response we get from the [non-Jewish] community," Unger said. "We reach out to them because Jews were alone during the Holocaust and we have to keep reminding them they have a stand in the issues, and we expect them to stand with us."

In Halifax, two young women who suffered from the effects of genocide in Rwanda and now live in Toronto spoke to about 200 people at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

In a service led primarily by Jewish high school and university students, the last writings of Holocaust victims were read. Every name uttered during the traditional candlelighting ceremony was of a young person under the age of 18, a graphic reminder of what was lost to humanity in the Holocaust.

Juliet Choco Karugahe and Sollange Umwalli pleaded for the phrase "never again" to truly mean never again.

Both women, in their early 20s, were born in Kenya as Rwandan refugees. Their Tutsi families had been expelled from Rwanda and they left large families there. In the 1994 Rwandan genocide, about one million Tutsis and moderate Hutus were murdered by extremist Hutus in 100 days. Large numbers of their families perished.

Umwalli returned to Rwanda in 1995 but the chaos made her realize she had no future there. She entered Canada in 1998 and has applied to study at York University.

"I was angry at myself and the world for not being there for the Rwandan people," she told a hushed audience in impeccable English. "I tried to understand how these things start, with dehumanizing racist remarks followed by people not looking at others as human. And I asked myself how humans could do what they do to other human beings."

Karugahe, 22, a student at University of Toronto, said the Holocaust is not a Jewish issue and Rwanda is not a Rwandan issue. "They are universal issues. One million were killed in 100 days because the international community was silent. Small minorities can accomplish this because of the silence.

"I hope I'm not too idealistic, but each of us can make a difference, in our own way, by making sure 'Never again' is never again."

Holocaust survivor Philip Riteman of Halifax spoke to 75 people in Charlottetown, including P.E.I. Premier Pat Binns. He also visited a junior high and high school, as well as the P.E.I. legislature for a brief memorial ceremony during his two-day visit.

In Saint John, N.B., Cohen spoke to a large audience at Shaarei Zedek Synagogue. In addition, prizes were presented to high school students from the general community who participated in an essay contest on the Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel.

Other ceremonies were also held In Moncton, N.B., St. John's, Nfld., and Sydney, N.S.

Quebec MNAs discuss Yom Hashoah

MONTREAL — Thirty-five Montreal-area high school students visited the National Assembly on Yom Hashoah, a trip organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, in co-operation with D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman.

On Dec. 15, 1999, the National Assembly unanimously adopted an act declaring the province's official recognition of Holocaust Memorial Day. The students were present during question period when various MNAs spoke on the occasion.

The newly merged City of Montreal passed a motion last month recognizing Yom Hashoah as "the day of remembrance of all victims of the Holocaust."

The motion was presented by executive committee member Marcel Tremblay, and officially seconded by opposition councillor Saulie Zajdel, who is also Quebec executive director of B'nai Brith Canada. Veteran councillor Marvin Rotrand, a child of Holocaust survivors, also seconded the motion, citing his appreciation of the gesture.

Students from Herzliah High School, Snowdon campus, also organized a musical Holocaust memorial program at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue.

Yom Hashoah speakers link Mideast crisis, Holocaust

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Citing a resurgence of anti-Semitism worldwide and noting that Israel was founded just after the Holocaust, Israel's consul general in Montreal told the community's Yom Hashoah memorial service last week that "a strong and vital State of Israel is the best response to anti-Semitism."

Shlomo Avital discussed the Holocaust in the context of the current Mideast crisis and its impact on Jews worldwide before a crowd of more than 2,000 people – including politicians, diplomats and community leaders – at Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem last Monday evening.

Under the watchful eye of police and private security, the event also included a solemn candlelighting ceremony, survivors' testimonies and Holocaust poetry.

Avital said Palestinian leaders are inciting hatred with "slogans like 'Kill the Jews,'" and portrayals of Israeli soldiers as Nazis.

He also called on Jews worldwide to be vigilant about the resurgence of anti-Semitism.

"This is not the time to be silent," Avital said, pointing to recent suicide bombings in Israel and the firebombing of synagogues in France and Belgium. He called the United Nations anti-racism conference, held last year in Durban, South Africa, "a most shameful event."

Avital then called for renewed participation of young people in the March of the Living and for all Jews to continue to visit Israel.

FEDERATION CJA president Steven Cummings also linked the Holocaust with recent events.

"When World War II ended, 'Never again' became our motto," Cummings said. "We said, 'Never again,' but in Brussels, a synagogue was firebombed."

Cummings also called attention to the recent desecration of three synagogues in Ottawa and the firebombing of a synagogue in Saskatoon.

"It is essential to show our support of Israel," Cummings said. "Jews of the Diaspora must stand together and fight against terrorism. We will not allow our people to be slaughtered."

Sidney Zoltak, co-chair, along with Sara Weinberg, of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's (MHMC) remembrance committee, recalled that his own Jewish community was first confined to a ghetto in 1942 before being shipped out to death camps.

"Of the 7,000 souls in my community, less than 70 survived," he said. "My community was history."

The memorial program, conducted in English, French, Yiddish and Hebrew, had as its centrepiece the lighting of six memorial candles, each representing one million Jews who were killed in the Holocaust.

Each candle was lit by three people – a survivor, a child of a survivor and a grandchild of a survivor.

During the candlelighting ceremony, survivors told of their experiences and Holocaust poetry was read by several second- and third-generation descendants of survivors.

In his chilling testimony, Mayer Schondorf recalled how his childhood in Bardejov, a shtetl in eastern Slovakia, "came to a crashing end in 1942."

While his family managed to briefly hide him in Hungary, Schondorf was soon deported, first to Birkenau and then to Auschwitz. On the infamous death march from Auschwitz in January 1945, he witnessed the death of his father.

Schondorf told the hushed assembly that when he was finally liberated from Buchenwald on April 11, 1945, at the age of 16, "I weighed less than 80 pounds."

After the war, Schondorf made his way back to Bardejov, but the community "had ceased to exist." Of the 4,000 Jews who lived in Bardejov at the beginning of 1942, only 200 survived. "May their memory live on forever," he said of the dead.

One of the most poignant moments came as the choir quietly sang Ani Maamin while Nina Ben-Ami, Israel's vice-consul in Montreal, and David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Eastern region, read the names of Holocaust victims.

As the program drew to a close, Schondorf was joined by second- and third-generation descendants in a promise to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive.

Holocaust Awareness Week held in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's Jewish community commemorated Holocaust Awareness Week recently with a bit of an ecumenical thrust. Among the highlights were a talk by Harold Bastable, a former RCAF officer, who was imprisoned in the Buchenwald concentration camp for three months in the fall of 1944, and a special presentation prepared by students at the Catholic Holy Cross School.

The week began with the annual memorial service at the north Winnipeg Bnay Abraham Synagogue, the only synagogue in the city with its own Holocaust memorial. Following the service – which was attended by more than 200 people – the name of the street outside was changed for the week, as is the tradition, to Avenue of the Warsaw Ghetto Heroes.

On April 8, the United Jewish Peoples Order and the Sholem Aleichem group sponsored a lecture by Winnipeg Jewish historian Dr. Allan Levine. Levine is the author of Fugitive of the Forest (Stoddart Publishing, 1998), about the wartime Jewish partisans who fought the Nazis – and often Russian and Polish partisans – in the forests of eastern Europe.

On April 9, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada presented its annual roll call of the names of Holocaust victims whose families live in Winnipeg. The annual memorial service at the Holocaust Monument on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature followed, with Manitoba Premier Gary Doer's public proclamation of Yom Hashoah.

The noon-hour ceremonies also included a messsage from Dr. Ian Goldstine, Winnipeg Jewish Federation president, from Yad Vashem, songs by Jewish elementary school choirs, a laying of flowers and a yahrzeit candlelighting.

In the evening, Ruth Gruber addressed a Winnipeg audience via live satellite from the 92nd Street Y in New York as part of the second annual North America-wide Kallah program broadcast throughout Canada and the United States. Gruber, a journalist and historian, spoke about her book Haven, an account of her efforts in 1944 with the U.S. government to bring 1,000 Jewish refugees out of war-torn Europe to safety in the United States.

Bastable spoke on the evening of April 10 about his experiences as a prisoner of war. Bastable, who is now 85, was shot down over France shortly after D-Day. After being rescued and hidden by the French Resistance, he was betrayed to the Nazis and jailed in Fresnes Prison in Paris. Immediately before Paris was liberated, the Germans transferred all the inmates of the Fresnes Prison into boxcars for a three-day journey to Buchenwald.

Bastable was one of 179 Allied airmen (including 27 Canadians) in the prison. All had been shot down over France, rescued by the Resistance and eventually betrayed to the Nazis. (Only one of the group, Joe Sonshine of Toronto, was Jewish.) Most of the airmen were in Buchenwald for two months before the regular German army learned of their existence and moved them to a standard prison camp.

Bastable, along with a few others, spent an extra three weeks in the concentration camp because they had been in the infirmary when the initial transfer took place.

The week concluded on April 11, with an education panel that discussed how to teach the Holocaust and with the Holy Cross students' presentation. One of the teachers at Holy Cross has made the Holocaust as a component of his human rights course.

Arafat says IDF pullback must accompany summit

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yasser Arafat has said he is prepared to accept an Israeli proposal for a regional peace conference if the United States supports the idea, but the Palestinian Authority chairman said the summit must be accompanied by an immediate withdrawal of Israeli troops from the West Bank.

The call Sunday by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for a regional conference on the Middle East that would include heads of state but exclude Arafat sparked skepticism at home and abroad that such a summit could happen without Arafat's participation.

Sharon said he had discussed his proposal for a regional peace conference under U.S. auspices with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell. It would involve a number of countries, including Israel, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco and Palestinian representatives. Sharon said Powell, who is in the region to try to halt spiralling Israeli-Palestinian violence, had accepted the idea.

Israeli officials were quoted by Israel Radio Monday as saying that a regional conference could take place in the United States within six weeks.

But their optimism was not widely shared. "The idea of a conference is excellent, and is congruent with the American interest in establishing a coalition of moderate states in the region," said Israeli cabinet minister Ephraim Sneh.

But he added that if Arafat were excluded from a conference of heads of state, "it would be an illusion to think that other participants would come.

"There's no point in deluding ourselves," Sneh said. "The other participants, those of whom the prime minister spoke, will not agree to our dictating the representation of the Palestinians."

Arafat, who called Fox News on Sunday from his besieged headquarters in Ramallah, said he would accept anything that had the backing of U.S. President George W. Bush that might achieve peace.

"Any initiative which would be declared by President Bush I will accept it to achieve peace...," Arafat said. "I am ready for an immediate conference, but at the same time immediate withdrawal (of Israeli troops). No one can accept occupation."

In announcing the conference idea after meeting Powell Sunday, Sharon said he and the secretary of state "continued to examine ways to arrive at peace between Israel and her neighbours, and in the Middle East in general.

"I said we are ready to have a regional conference in which a number of countries would participate – Israel, Egypt, the Saudis, Jordan, Morocco and Palestinian representatives. It doesn't have to be limited to these," Sharon said.

"The conference would be hosted by the United States. This idea is acceptable to the United States and I estimate that within a short period of time the conference will indeed convene," added Sharon, who first proposed the idea before last month's Arab summit in Beirut and again in the Knesset.

A senior U.S. State Department official said that no venue, participants or timing have been set.

Leftist opposition leader Yossi Sarid dismissed Sharon's proposal as a "public relations trick that has nothing to it." He said Sharon proposed it because "he understands that he must present something of a diplomatic nature at the end of the 'rolling operation' in the West Bank.

"I don't think it will be possible to convene a conference without Arafat, not because I personally miss Arafat especially, but because the lack of his presence is unnatural. It is an Israeli dictate that cannot be accepted and that everyone will reject."

Sarid said that many participants would probably prefer a conference without Sharon, as well, but the presence of both leaders is essential to any chance of progress.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told Reuters that Sharon's idea was a "waste of time" and no substitute for a peace plan floated by Saudi Arabia and backed by last month's Arab summit.

The Saudi proposal offers Arab recognition of Israel in exchange for Israel's withdrawal to pre-1967 borders.

"If Sharon wants to talk about peace, he can accept the [Saudi-backed] Arab peace initiative or agree to end the occupation and withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines," Erekat said.

Media get first look at Jenin refugee camp

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel

JENIN, West Bank — For the first time since the IDF entered Jenin to flush out terrorists, representatives of the media were allowed last weekend to go into the refugee camp.

The members of the media were taken in IDF vehicles past the devastated former local headquarters of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's security services. The central square of Jenin no longer exists, just a featureless, vast mass of building rubble, twisted girders, dust and dirt. Mounds of wreckage up to 25 feet high made the scene look like the aftermath of a major earthquake.

The IDF said that to advance 100 metres took a full day of fighting.

Despite the heaviness of the fighting the IDF said that about 45 militants had been killed, not the hundreds claimed by the Palestinians. Reporters were told by the IDF that there had been no "massacres," as alleged by Palestinians and that the vast majority of Palestinian casualties were armed militants because the army had used surgical, precision warfare to minimize harm to civilians.

The fighting was house to house, window by window. Every few yards there was another booby trap. But any ammunition the IDF used was very specifically targeted at places where guns were firing. The Israeli forces could have wiped out resistance without sustaining casualties themselves by carpet bombing from the air, but that would have killed many civilians so the idea was shelved, IDF spokespersons said.

Army officers said most of the camp's 15,000 residents had been evicted by terrorists, who then booby-trapped their homes, while some of the remaining civilians were used as human shields against army assault.

The terrorists had also destroyed water mains all over the camp. The IDF reported that when they first entered the camp, most of the houses were already empty of civilians. The camp was ready for war. There had been no serious interruptions of food supplies and the IDF filled any gaps by sending in trucks with food and bottled water.

It also kept the Jenin hospital supplied with oxygen and medicines throughout the conflict. Most of the 23 Israeli soldiers killed and the many more wounded were casualties of booby-traps, the IDF said.

Booby-trapped items included discarded AK-47 assault rifles, garbage bags, chairs, bedroom drawers and fridges.

Any walls in the camp surviving upright were plastered with Hamas and Islamic Jihad martyr posters, even over the doorways of pharmacies.

Attempts have been made to retrieve bodies, but the fact that the area is so heavily booby-trapped made it difficult to do this, especially since some of the bodies themselves could be booby trapped. The other difficulty was the work involved in co-ordinating the evacuation of the bodies on an individual basis by the Red Cross and Red Crescent.

Kiev synagogue attacked; three injured

KIEV, Ukraine — About 50 youths attacked the central synagogue in Kiev on Saturday evening, beating worshippers with stones and bottles and destroying property, according to a report from Associated Press.

Kiev's chief rabbi, Moshe-Reuven Azman, said the mob marched down the capital's main boulevard shouting, "Kill the Jews!" before attacking the synagogue just after 9 p.m.

However, police denied it was an anti-Semitic attack, saying it was a case of soccer-related hooliganism.

Rabbi Azman said the youths knocked Tsvi Kaplan, rector of the Kiev yeshiva, to the ground and beat him with stones. Kaplan was hospitalized overnight and released Sunday.

Rabbi Azman's 14-year-old son and a security guard were also injured, the rabbi said, adding that the attackers broke 20 windows in the synagogue.

"I call this act a pogrom," Rabbi Azman said. "It's a miracle that it was not worse."

Ukrainian police detained three Kiev youths in connection to the incident and opened a routine investigation, the Interfax news agency said.

The Interior Ministry, like the police, said that "the act was not motivated by anti-Semitism, but was an act of brutal hooliganism," according to Interfax.

Powell: Border attacks may lead to wider conflict

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said Monday Washington is concerned that guerrilla attacks by the militant Lebanese-based Hezbollah organization along Israel's northern border could lead to a broader Mideast conflict.

"There is a very real danger of the situation along the border widening the conflict in the region," Powell said after talks with Lebanese President Emile Lahoud on curbing attacks on Israel by the militant Hezbollah organization.

The talks aimed to avoid a harsh Israeli reprisal and an escalation of border hostilities, sources said.

"It is essential for all those committed to peace to act immediately to stop actions across the border. This is the message I have conveyed and will continue to convey to all governments in the region... This is the purpose of my trip to Beirut and to Damascus," Powell said.

Shortly before Powell's arrival, Lebanese Information Minister Ghazi Aridi said Powell would be told cross-border guerrilla attacks against Israeli troops would likely continue.

But Lebanon seeks to confine the cross-border fighting to the disputed Shaaba Farms area on the border with the Golan Heights and not allow attacks into northern Israel, Aridi said.

Aridi accused the United States of being indifferent to the killing and suffering in the Palestinian territories and to the prospect the conflict will escalate into a regional conflagration.

"For the Americans, it's no problem if the region descends into chaos and destruction, sees mass massacres, mass annihilation, an Israeli holocaust against the Palestinians, Nazism, fascism, terrorism, detention camps, expulsions, killings, displacement of people, starving and depriving people of water," Aridi said.

Aridi said there could be no solution to the fighting without recognition of Palestinian rights and a withdrawal from Lebanese and Syrian land.

Israel nabs key Fatah leader in Ramallah

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — West Bank Fatah leader Marwan Barghouti was arrested Monday in Ramallah by an elite army unit, army sources said.

Israel had been on a manhunt for the head of the Tanzim, a military wing of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's Fatah organization, since the start of military operations on March 29. The efforts began with an attempt to capture him in a Palestinian security installation in the West Bank town of Beitounia, but Barghouti managed to escape.

The IDF carried out an intense search for the Fatah leader.

Also arrested in the operation was Ahmad Barghouti, who is among the Tanzim leaders in Ramallah. After getting intelligence information, army tanks surrounded the home of a Fatah activist in Ramallah.

Ahmad was arrested first and said that Marwan was also in the house. The arrest was carried out without any shots being fired. Security sources said the two will be interrogated then put on trial.

Israel holds Barghouti responsible for direct involvement in numerous terror attacks, including giving orders and providing funds to members of the Tanzim military wing.

After everything that has happened, how can Israel trust Arafat?

The following is a letter from Deputy Prime Minister of Israel Natan Sharansky.

April 8, 2002
Jerusalem

Dear Friends,

As we continue to face critical days and mounting pressures, I feel it is important to share firsthand some thoughts on the events of the last few days.

U.S. President George W. Bush's recent statement concerning events in the Middle East was of historical importance. He stated with a simple but profound clarity that "the Palestinian people deserve a government which respects human rights."

For a decade, the entire civilized world, with Israel and the United States leading, betrayed its principles by promoting, supporting, and condoning a corrupt leader who suppressed any Palestinian impulse and aspiration to a free and just society. Israel's leaders cynically and fallaciously reasoned that this would be good for us because such a dictator would suppress terrorism in exchange for his international rehabilitation and a licence to plunder his people. It would be easier, our leaders told themselves, because he would not be hindered by human rights organizations or by a Supreme Court.

This bargain with the devil, as all others, was bound to boomerang. Not only did Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat fail to curb terrorism, he recruited, supported and directed the terrorists themselves in the most cruel and inhumane acts of wanton and indiscriminate violence yet witnessed.

In the face of Bush's clear statement that Arafat betrayed his obligations and refused to fight the terrorists, how can Israel trust him in yet another promise to stop terrorism? Terrorism will be eliminated when we eliminate it, and the terrorists will be incarcerated when we take them into captivity. The Tenet agreement which is being promoted by the U.S. administration as an appropriate exchange for a premature cessation of our efforts at effective self-help is based on an obligation by Arafat to arrest and punish the same terrorists with whom he is closeted in Ramallah. Arafat has not merely failed to thwart terrorism – he has promoted, enlisted and paid the terrorists per suicide bomb assembled. He has perpetuated and exploited the misery of the Palestinian Arabs.

How can anyone seriously treat Arafat and his corrupt gang of terrorists as partners for peace? Arafat has finally been exposed and his naked duplicity, wickedness and corruption can no longer be clothed by us in self-deception.

By ignoring Arafat's despotism, corruption and flagrant disregard for agreements, we not only betrayed our own principles, we thereby enabled the growth and spread of terrorism until it reached the inconceivable and monstrous proportions of today.

In the last month, over 150 of us have been murdered by sitting in a café, or by going to the supermarket or by celebrating the Feast of Freedom with our families on seder night. Statistically, for our small society, this is a loss even greater than that of Sept. 11. But this story is not one of statistics. For with each family suffering a loss, there is unbearable grief and pain and a terrible, neverending void. And for each family suffering a death, tens of other families have had members permanently disabled, injured and scarred.

At the funeral of my housing ministry colleague, Aviel Ron, and his two murdered children, his widow, the mother of their two children cried out in utter disbelief: "Zeh lo yachol lihiyot!" – this cannot be happening. This is what all of us are all saying, and all of us must do everything in our power to make absolutely sure that this does not continue to happen!

What our defence forces are doing now is long overdue. Our vast intelligence networks are working together intensively to identify the leaders and carriers of this explosive and venomous terrorism. We are determined to reach the villains and not innocent Palestinians. Because we are so careful to avoid unnecessary losses – on both sides – we must proceed carefully, deliberately and surgically. Those we seek out hide behind innocent civilians, especially, children and adolescents. They hide in churches and mosques and take monks and nuns hostage. Those we are chasing booby trap houses and even churches. Advancing cautiously means moving methodically and slowly. We cannot treat every house as booby-trapped and bomb it, lest we risk injuring innocent people – but we must treat every house as if it might be booby trapped, lest we risk the lives of our young soldiers.

Because of these circumstances, we need several weeks to eliminate most of the sources of terrorism. This is a job which can be done effectively. We have already arrested over 400 terrorists, about 100 of whom actually committed the murders. We have arrested those who directed the massacres at the Dolphinarium, at Seafood and at Sbarro Pizza.

The terrorist responsible for the massacre at the seder in Netanya was killed in a highly sophisticated operation conducted by the Israel Defence Forces and the security forces.

We can do the job responsibly, effectively and honourably, but we must be given the proper time. If we are forced to recede before the completion of our mission, we will, at some point, have to return. And the cost to us and the price in innocent lives will be far greater.

History teaches us that Jews have often been killed in cruel and unusual ways, from the harugei hamalchut in Roman times to the Inquisition, pogroms, and more recently, the gas chambers. Now, we experience yet another cruel innovation – human suicide bombs.

But this time, things are different. For we have a sovereign Jewish State to defend and protect its citizens. Israel's first responsibility is to protect us from this recent wave of carnage. And by protecting us from this new weapon of terror, Israel defends freedom and civilized values everywhere. To prematurely end our campaign against this new threat is to place our innocent civilians in harm's way to the detriment of all.

Israel must be no less resolute in fighting terrorism directed against us than the United States in fighting terrorism against its citizens. The wishful thinking of Oslo has long since self-destructed and we can no longer pretend that Arafat is a partner for peace.

You are no doubt facing conflicting pressures and will face even more in the next few days. The media is reporting what it understands based on many fragmented sources. I can promise you that the true story is really quite clear. We are a democratic state fighting to eliminate the worst wave of terrorism unleashed against a civilian population in human history. This campaign, which will require several weeks, has only one purpose: to dismantle the terrorist infrastructure that was built by the Palestinian Authority and its leader Arafat with Israeli, U.S. and European resources.

To force us to stop before its completion would be a tragic error. These are not easy times, but more than ever they call for us to be united in this campaign to eliminate terror. This is the humane course; this is the only course consistent with Bush's forthright stand against terror.

We need your understanding. We need your support. And we need them now as never before. I know the power and glory of Jewish unity and I know that, together, we can prevail.

Natan Sharansky
Deputy Prime Minister of Israel.

Explosion damages Tunisian shul

TEL AVIV — A gas tanker truck filled with cooking oil crashed into the outer wall of the historic Ghriba synagogue in Djerba, a resort island on the Tunisian coast, last Thursday, killing 17 people and damaging the outer wall of the ancient synagogue.

The Tunisian government said the explosion was caused by an accident, but Israel's Foreign Ministry suspects the explosion was a deliberate attack on North Africa's largest synagogue.

Five Tunisians as well as 11 German tourists and a Frenchman were killed. The truck driver was among the dead.

Initial reports said 32 people were injured, but some have since died from their injuries.

Tunisian security services and judicial authorities opened investigations into the blast, which damaged the facade of the historic blue-and-white synagogue located in an olive field.

Perez Trabelsi, the synagogue's president, said he did not believe the incident was an attack. "I think it's an accident, and that it has no link to the situation in Israel," he said. "If it was an attack, it would have targeted people inside the synagogue."

But Israeli sources said Trabelsi may have been forced to line up with the government's version of events.

The blast could be heard five kilometres away and witnesses said it led to panic inside the shul, with people suffocating and fleeing shattering glass, Agence France Presse (AFP) reported.

A Tunisian human rights group told AFP the official version of events should be "treated with caution," since the shul is on a no-through road.

And Shalom Cohen, the Israeli foreign ministry official in charge of North Africa told the news agency that "to arrive at this synagogue, you have to really want to go there… there is even a roadblock. It could not be an accident."

German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said he expects a full investigation into the truck explosion. His government believes the explosion was deliberate, but Tunisian authorities maintain it was an accident and said Monday there were no new signs it was a suicide attack.

Schroeder told German television there were "indications suggesting it was an attack."

Djerba is a popular tourist destination off the southeast coast of the North African nation. The synagogue was open to visitors when the incident occurred.

There are about 1,200 Jews in Tunisia, and half live on the island.

The ribs, after 12 hours' slow baking and char-broiling, literally fall off the bone; you can eat them without using your fingers. The meat is aged in-house and fish selected daily; sauces and dressings are also made fresh daily. You'll love the mahogany interior, with its deep, rich reds; Frank Sinatra and Billy Halliday seranade. Come for dinner before the theatre, and return for dessert after.

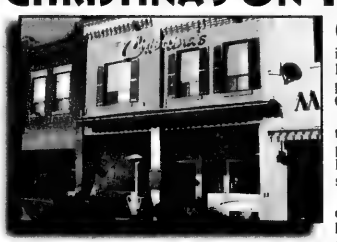
CHRISTINA'S ON THE DANFORTH



Christina's triumphant return to the Danforth has recaptured the essence of fine Greek dining and the magnetic ambience it once enjoyed. If you enjoy authentic Greek cuisine in a truly pleasant, vibrant atmosphere, you'll love the new Christina's.

Its decor beautifully updated, its menu revitalized, Christina's will tempt you with generous portions, exceptionally reasonable prices, and the Danforth's friendliest patio — slated to open as soon as weather permits.

If you want to truly spoil Mom — on Mother's Day or any time — Christina's will vindicate her affinity for Home Cooking. From the dolmades to the Greek salads, from the succulent leg of lamb to the Kolokithokeftedes — minced, mildly spiced zucchini patties with potato, onion and parsley, gently pan-fried to golden crispness — every bite is heavenly. Warmly recommended.

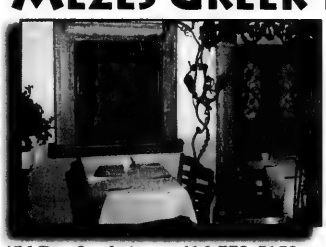
MEZES GREEK RESTAURANT



An obsession for freshness and quality have made Mezes one of the busiest restaurants not only on the Danforth, but in all of Toronto. Mezes makes all dishes to order from the highest quality ingredients, starting with the finest cold-pressed extra-virgin olive oil from Greece. You can really taste the difference — in the lamb chops, in the fresh red snapper, in the delectable variety of vegetarian dishes, even in the appetizers.

By adhering to this simple formula (freshness and quality) with unwavering consistency, owner Sue Zindros and her sister Christine, the head chef, have established a standard which clearly resonates with their ever-growing clientele. A must visit for Greek food lovers.

Pan's reputation for creative flair is unrivalled. As the Danforth's only three-star restaurant, it caters to a discriminating clientele that expects each and every visit to be a culinary experience. Maintaining this high standard, owner Peter Kyriacou is constantly updating Pan's eclectic Mediterranean menu. Try the Atlantic salmon stuffed with mushrooms and baby spinach, wrapped in a delicate layer of phyllo pastry. Or perhaps you'd prefer the jumbo quail, stuffed with sausage, mushroom and shallots, finished with pearl onion and a dark roast chicken and red wine reduction.

The atmosphere is intimate and candle-lit, but vivacious, with lively music. It's an ideal spot for Mother's Day, or any special occasion where wonderful food and a vibrant atmosphere go hand in hand.

Jewish Film Festival gets underway April 20th

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs at the Bloor Cinema from April 20 to April 28 and presents an eclectic selection of movies from around the world. Here, in capsule form, are reviews of six festival offerings.

Seventeen years ago, French documentarian Claude Lanzmann released Shoah, a gripping, though interminable, account of Holocaust survivors' remembrances.

The outtakes from Shoah, a lengthy film in itself, seemed so compelling that Lanzmann decided to use them in two separate films.

The first, A Visitor from the Living (1997), turned on a self-incriminating interview with a smug Red Cross official who wrote an incredibly bland – and inaccurate – report about conditions in the Theresienstadt concentration camp, a waystation to Auschwitz.

The second, Sobibor, October 14, 1943, 4 PM, a co-presentation of Cinematheque Ontario and the festival, will be screened April 25 at 9:30 p.m.

Like A Visitor from the Living, Sobibor also features a talking head, and is understated in tone. The interviewee, Yehuda Lerner, tells of the revolt by Jewish prisoners in Sobibor in the fall of 1943, when the Holocaust was well underway.

Yehuda Lerner tells of the revolt by Jewish prisoners in Sobibor.

Lerner, now an Israeli citizen, was 16 when he was taken from the Warsaw ghetto and his parents were dispatched to Treblinka, never to return.

By the time he found himself in Sobibor in September 1943, Lerner had escaped from eight different camps. For reasons which remain unexplained, his German captors did not shoot him, the usual punishment for escapees. Nor was Lerner sent straight to the gas chambers. Was it luck or something else?

Lerner participated in the revolt, during which 11 guards were killed. The rebellion was organized by a Red Army officer, Alexander Petchersky, who, as Lanzmann notes, "is no longer among us." Lerner speaks for himself and the others, the living and the dead, in this relatively absorbing film.

During World War II, Bulgaria, along with Denmark, stood out as beacons in a dark landscape. They had the distinction of being the only countries in Nazi-occupied Europe to resist demands for the deportation of their Jewish citizens.

The Optimists: The Story of the Rescue of the Bulgarian Jews from the Holocaust (April 22 at 11 a.m.) explains how this Balkan nation, with its 50,000 Jews, made history.

Jacky and Lisa Comforty, whose families were among the rescued, mix archival footage and interviews in their informative 82-minute film.

Bulgarian Jews, most of whom were Sephardim whose ancestors had been expelled from Spain in the 15th century, lived in harmony with their Christian neighbours. Bulgaria's constitution, drawn up after World War I, guaranteed equal rights for all.

Bulgaria, however, formed an alliance with Germany, its chief trading partner, and in 1940, Bogdan Filov, an anti-Semite, became prime minister. His pro-German government promulgated laws that stripped Jews of their civil rights and forced Jewish males into labour camps.

By 1943, Bulgaria was ready to succumb to German demands to deport Jews. But under mounting pressure from an informal coalition of decent Bulgarians, ranging from politicians to clerics, the deportations were delayed and, in fact, not implemented. Much to its shame, though, Bulgaria allowed non-Bulgarian Jews from occupied Thrace and Macedonia, some 15,000, to be deported to their deaths.

Through conversations with Bulgarian Jews and Christians, several of which are quite emotional, the Comfortys present a stirring tale of national defiance and heroism.

Forging Identity: History Under Cover (April 21 at 1 p.m.) revolves around Adolphe Kaminsky, a master forger who saved thousands of Jews in France during the Holocaust.

A white-bearded man now in his mid-70s, Kaminsky gravitated toward forgery out of sheer necessity. Faced with the need to protect his family from imminent harm, he provided them with false papers. He had a knack for being able to reproduce flawless documents.

After the war, Kaminsky produced false identity papers for Jews bound for Palestine. He also fought for Algeria's independence and worked with anti-imperialist movements in Latin America.

Jacques Falck's film, interesting as it is, fails to penetrate Kaminsky's cloistered personality, and he remains something of an enigma.

Monique Schwarz's documentary, Mamadrama: The Jewish Mother in Cinema (April 23 at 7:15 p.m.), offers a credible explanation of why mainstream Hollywood movies have invariably portrayed American Jewish mothers in less-than-flattering terms. More often than not, they are demanding, manipulative, bossy and domineering.

Yet, in Yiddish and Israeli films, the Jewish mother is usually a tower of strength and sensitivity rather than a shrew. And judging by Schwarz's own mother, a Holocaust survivor from Austria who settled in Australia, Jewish mothers can be a source of inspiration and, perhaps, a daughter's best friend. In Mamadrama, Schwarz methodically examines these various strands.

Artist believes nature and humanity are inseparable

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Philosophy and art come together in the works of Israeli-born artist Adi Zur.

In a recent solo exhibition at Gallery 401 titled Ebb and Flow, Zur displayed her encaustic works – paintings produced by burning with colours.

In an interview, Zur said her work lies "between abstract and figurative" and is the result of her belief that nature and humanity are inseparable.

"I strive to express this by utilizing oils, wax and my photography, which focuses on parts of the human body," she said, noting that this process "serves to deliver the coupled essence of re-building and rebirth."

Zur, who was born and raised in Israel, studied at the Institute of Art and the Academy of Art Teachers in Tel Aviv. In 1991, she came to Canada with her husband and three children and graduated with a major in drawing and painting from Toronto's Ontario College of Art & Design (OCAD).

She said the rich natural landscape of Israel is a constant source of inspiration to her and a reminder of an ancient past.

"I believe that if we go to an ancient time to find our source, we would all agree with what Carl Jung said about 'archetypal unconscious' to be true – the past is common to all human beings."

As a child, she said, she was always drawing and painting. "We spent a lot of time in the fields picking flowers and we played in an old graveyard. It made me feel that I was connected to the past and to the earth. In my paintings, I emphasize the cycle of life, death and rebirth."

Zur, who also graduated from Tel Aviv University with a major in philosophy, said her subconscious is the driving force behind her paintings.

There is a mystery in her work because objects are hidden under layers and you have to find them, she said, adding that there is also an ambiguity in her work just as there is ambiguity in her feelings about living in Canada.

"I like the quiet here and I can paint, yet my soul is in Israel," she said.

Zur has showcased her work in numerous venues and group exhibitions throughout the city. Her latest exhibit will be at an open house at OCAD on May 10, 11 and 12.

For more information about Zur, call 905-886-6984 or e-mail adizur50@hotmail.com.

Eclectic selection of movies at Jewish Film Fest

Duki Dor, in Taqasim (April 23 at 1:15 p.m.), follows Felix Mizrahi, an Israeli violinist deeply attached to his roots, on a sentimental journey to Cairo, his place of birth. Mizrahi's brother, Farag Ibrahim, was once a prominent musician in Egypt. Now, years later, in 2000, Mizrahi scours Cairo for lost recordings of his late brother's work.

In search of these priceless vinyl artifacts, Mizrahi revisits his childhood neighbourhood, contacts the Israel Academic Centre and wanders into a musty music store. Toward the close of his trip, he tries in vain to find his brother's headstone in the crumbling Bassatine Jewish cemetery, now vandalized by thieves.

Taqasim, in Hebrew and Arabic with English subtitles, is a paean to the power of memory and the borderless nature of music.

Keep on Walking (April 24 at 9:30 p.m.) is a lively portrait of Joshua Nelson, an African-American who bridges the gap between Jews and blacks in the United States. A gospel singer and preacher who observes the rituals of Judaism, Nelson is a study in sharp contrasts, or, as he cheerfully puts it, "the Ku Klux Klan's worst nightmare."

Raised by his Jewish mother as a black Hebrew, Nelson is an articulate and passionate young man, a Jew in mind and spirit. Mingling effortlessly with Jews and blacks alike, Nelson is alternatively seen performing spirituals in a church, laying tfillin, kissing a Torah, reading from a Passover haggadah and visiting the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

Keep on Walking is truly a cross-cultural experience.

ALFRED UHRY PLAY LAST NIGHT OF BALLYHOO AT HOLY BLOSSOM

Holy Blossom Temple's Stagecraft Company presents The Last Night of Ballyhoo, by acclaimed playwright Alfred Uhry, as its spring production.

The play is a romantic comedy by the author of Driving Miss Daisy. It depicts the trials and tribulations in December 1939 of the Freitags, an elitist German-Jewish family from Atlanta. War has broken out in Europe and Atlanta is focused on the premiere of Gone With The Wind.

Highly assimilated, the Freitags are preoccupied with Christmas and who is going to Ballyhoo, the social event of the season. But their lives change when the family patriarch, Adolph Freitag, brings home a new employee, Joe Farkas, a traditional Jew from New York who falls in love with Sunny Freitag. The family eventually come to terms with their Jewish heritage.

Michael Ryval, who directs the play, calls it "a warm-hearted comedy that unveils all the jealousies and passions within two generations of one family." Ballyhoo won the 1997 Tony Award for best new play.

Stagecraft has previously presented productions of The Sisters Rosensweig, The Price, Yentl, Crossing Delancey and other plays with Jewish themes and content.

Tickets $10 in advance, $12 at the door. Seniors and students $6 on Thursday and Sunday. Holy Blossom Temple, Eisendrath Auditorium. April 25, 27 and 28, 7:30 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext. 511.

Waiting for the Messiah deals with love, acceptance and security

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Waiting for the Messiah, an Argentine film, is set in Buenos Aires' vibrant Jewish community in the late 1990s, around the time that the market collapse in Asia had its repercussions felt worldwide.

The movie, playing at the AMC Interchange 30 in Vaughan – not part of the Jewish Film Festival – is a poignant slice of life that focuses on the lives of two disparate men.

Ariel, a Jewish man in his early 20s, is being groomed to take over his father's kosher restaurant and marry his childhood sweetheart. But instead, he takes a job at a cable TV station and falls in love with a co-worker, Laura, a gentile bisexual.

At the same time, a bankworker, Santamaria, loses his job as a result of the financial crisis and finds himself on the streets, making a living by retrieving stolen wallets and purses for their owners. He falls in love with a woman who works as a washroom attendant at a train station.

The two parallel tales seem to be loosely linked by a sense of despair that all the characters share. The main characters are looking for something that seems to be just out of their grasp.

Directed by one of Argentina's top directors, Daniel Burman, this film deals with strong universal themes like love, acceptance, financial security and religion.

Enrique Pineyro won the Best Actor Award at the Buenos Aires film festival for his role as Santamaria in Waiting for the Messiah, which screened at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2000, and the movie won the Best Film Award at the Havana Film Festival. It is in Spanish with English subtitles.

Don't get tsabrochen, Jackie's back in town

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Does this shtick remind you of anyone in particular?

"President Bush talks very well, but English is not really his field."

Or how about this:

"Cars are getting smaller so if you pay $300,000 for a car there is no room to sit in it."

Or what about this observation about the high price of designer coffee versus the fare presented at traditional coffee shops:

The fancy shops make a big deal about a drop of hot cream in their coffee while coffee shops "give you enough cream to pass away for 80 cents."

Jackie Mason

If those lines don't scream Jackie Mason at you, then chances are you're tsabrochen or tsaklopt and probably never heard the one about the Jew and the boat (it sleeps six, no, mine sleeps eight). Or maybe you were out of the country staying at a five-star hotel, hopefully not a four-star hotel, never a three-star hotel, and God forbid, you'd never admit to staying at a two-star hotel.

Mason will be bringing his unique brand of stand-up comedy to Toronto's New Yorker Theatre for a two week run from April 22 to May 5.

Known for his politically incorrect observations of the human experience, Mason promises "a hot new show" – billed as Prune Danish – filled with material that is up to date and topical.

"My goal is to be as current as what people are talking about at the dinner table," he said in a telephone interview from New York.

The sexual revolution ("Why is it women never pay a cheque in a restaurant?"), President Bush ("He still looks like he can't believe he got the job") and current social trends ("You think a murderer is going to tell airport security that his suitcase was packed by the Taliban") are among the issues addressed by Mason.

Besides pointing out the absurdities of life, there is a serious side to his humour, in which he skewers our materialistic lifestyle and pokes fun at the never-ending quest for status symbols.

"The luxuries of life don't interest me," he says, before launching into a diatribe on the Jew who purchases a 26-room house, spends all his time in the den and then gets upset when a friend moves into a 28-room home.

Instead of worrying about material possessions, Mason spends his time (when he isn't on the road performing, which is almost every day) reading and writing, particularly about Israel.

His no holds barred commentaries, written in conjunction with attorney Raoul Felder, appear in The American Prowler (formerly The Spectator Online) and they co-author an op-ed column for The Washington Times.

Mason is looking forward to a return to Toronto, where he performed about two years ago. "I love Toronto. I think it's the most underestimated place in the world... It has everything."

The last question asked, Mason winds up the conversation: "I can hear from your voice that it's over, thank you, all the best, and I hope you keep your job."

Mayumana shows Israel's fun side

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There isn't anything distinctly Ashkenazi or Sephardi about Mayumana. But there is something unmistakably Israeli about the production.

It brings together the bohemian sights and sounds of Tel Aviv's Rechov Shinkin, the sarcastic dry humour of Shaki Ofir and the rhythms of a generation of Israeli kids who are immersed in an eclectic world-mix of drama, music and dance.

Mayumana, which appeared at the Elgin Theatre last week and will be returning to Toronto soon, combined percussions, body movements and dramatic skits that quickly evolved from one scene into another. The result was a fast-moving, feel-good show that showed the lighter, funner side of Israel.

The group of 10 actors shared the stage with garbage cans, tanks of water and rubber balls in a Stomp-like display of percussion and dance. The musical performance was also interspersed with frequent clownish comedy skits, so that the audience never felt a moment's lag.

And for just a short time – during the duration of the show – I almost forgot the political problems of the country the performers came from. Instead, I felt as if I had just taken my family to a coffee shop in Tel Aviv with good friends and laughed away the evening.

At a time when my teenage kids and I don't often share the same taste in entertainment, we could all agree that Mayumana was, like, whoa!

LATE JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL CHANGE

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is postponing its screening of the controversial documentary The Accused, originally scheduled for April 23. In its place the Festival will present a "sneak preview" of a very important new feature-length U.S. documentary.

After 100 years, Max is still sharp

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A few weeks ago, nearly 100 people gathered at the Oakdale Golf and Country Club to celebrate Max Sharp's 100th birthday. Not a huge crowd, but quite amazing when you consider that everyone there was family.

They came together to pay tribute to their durable patriarch – his four children, 19 grandchildren and 38 great-grandchildren – and to celebrate a life that, in many ways, has reflected the struggles and joys of the Jewish people. He was a builder – in more ways than one.

Sharp wasn't well enough to conduct an interview for this story, although he still lives in the same Bathurst Street penthouse he's occupied since 1955; he is alert, spry, and, excuse the expression, still sharp.

In an interview for a magazine article in 1987, on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of his marriage to his beloved Lil, Sharp told me the secret to such a long union. "Listen," he said, "I just read about a couple celebrating their 80th anniversary. I got something to live for. I'm in no hurry."

He took his time, but got a lot done, and never lost a sunny outlook on life, even after Lil's death in 1990 at age 82.

"He was always a kind and tolerant person. He always had time to listen," says his son Isadore (Issy), chair and CEO of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts. "He never judged. He accepted things as they were."

Eyebrows are often raised when people learn that Sharp was born in the Polish town of Auschwitz, well before that name became synonymous with death and was still called Oswiecim. His father, Moshe Yakov Scharf, was a prominent rabbi and shochet who fled to Berlin after World War I when Polish pogroms became too much to bear for his 10 children. Young Max, though, made his way to Krakow to train as a chalutz (pioneer) in case Palestine beckoned.

Max Sharp, at age 90 in Israel.

It did, in 1920. Sharp arrived at the port of Haifa on his 18th birthday, and went to work, first as a shomer (guard) and then as a farmer in the Lower Galilee during the day, and as a baker in the evening – all while defending against Arab invaders.

"At midnight," he recalled, "we would still have enough energy to dance the horah and sing Hebrew folk songs around a campfire. I'd go to sleep after midnight and get up at four. I loved every minute."

He also learned valuable trades: plastering and tiling, which stood him in good stead when he later organized a co-op of 10 bonim (builders). Together, they helped build Degania, Israel's first kibbutz.

But only a few months later, Sharp decided he needed a new challenge. He had a brother Louie in Toronto, and decided to join him. That's how Max met his wife. Louie was married to Rose Godfrey. Rose's sister was Lena (Lil) Godfrey. Five years after his arrival in Toronto, Max wed Lil. Two brothers had married two sisters.

Max and Louie set up a journeyman plastering and construction business, earning Max the princely sum of $15 a week. He soon struck out on his own, but lost everything on his first job, plus future earnings. The family somehow made it through the Depression. Max built homes, moved his growing brood in, and then moved out as soon as the next house was finished.

"During the 1930s and '40s, we occupied 15 different houses in just about as many years," remembers Bea Eisen, Sharp's daughter. "Mom did the decorating, while Dad built the next one." Sharp's children, Edith (Edie), Bea, Issy and Nancy (Neddie) thought that was how everyone lived.

In 1952, Issy joined his father in the construction business, helping with plastering and bricklaying. In 1961, Issy, with partners Murray Koffler and Eddie Creed (the latter his brother-in-law) defied all predictions and opened the first Four Seasons "Motor Hotel" on Jarvis Street. Issy never looked back, and today oversees 54 luxury hotels in 25 countries.

Max, meantime, was also involved in the construction of the first Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue on St. Clair Avenue. When the contractor declared bankruptcy midstream, he and some friends finished the building with their own experienced hands.

He retired at age 60. At 90, he shot a hole-in-one at Oakdale. Today, he still joins family members for a daily lunch.

"Dad taught all of us the meaning of life and happiness," says daughter Neddie. "We are so fortunate to have him in our lives."

High school hockey prepared Schneider for NHL

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Los Angeles Kings defenceman Mathieu Schneider says he probably learned more about Judaism in a Catholic high school than he had anywhere else.

During his days at Mount St. Charles Academy in Woonsocket, R.I., a school with a nationally-recognized hockey program, Schneider took a required religion course that brought him closer than ever before to his heritage.

"Aside from it being a Catholic high school, we weren't really preached to," said Schneider, who attended the occasional mass at the time. "I don't really think it was a lot different than going to any other private school or public school for that matter."

Growing up in the New York City area, Schneider had been so immersed in sports and his studies that Judaism took a back seat. His father, Sam, who is Jewish, taught him the basics of religion and took him and his brother Jean-Alain to synagogue on the High Holy Days, but that was about the only role Judaism played in their lives.

The boys' Roman Catholic mother, Aline, a French-Canadian, converted to Judaism. Sam grew up in Rhode Island and coached youth hockey teams in the area.

Schneider said his father sent him to a Catholic high school to better his chances of being drafted to play in the National Hockey League.

That dream came true when the Montreal Canadiens selected him in the third round of the 1987 entry draft. Schneider, now 32, would go on to win the Stanley Cup with the Habs in 1993.

Jean-Alain, three years younger, never did make it to the pros, but he was a part of the 1997 gold-medal winning Canadian hockey team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

On the international hockey scene, Mathieu was well on his way to being selected to the U.S. Olympic team last November, having already represented his country at the 1998 Nagano Olympics and on the 1996 World Cup-winning U.S. team.

In his second year with the Kings, the 14-year veteran was tied for the team lead in scoring with 13 points in 15 games. (He had a highly-successful debut season last year with L.A. after two sub-par years with the New York Rangers. He had 51 points last year, three shy of his career high.)

But the 1996 all-star, who signed with the Kings as a free agent in August 2000, was playing in pain last fall.

Groin problems that had plagued him over the past six seasons got progressively worse. A hernia was detected and an ultrasound revealed a torn stomach muscle.

Surgery was scheduled immediately and the 6-foot, 201-lb. blueliner was out for seven weeks and missed 23 games. Schneider then missed two more games early in the new year with a strained left shoulder.

"Right now I'm happy we went for the surgery [rather than opt for rehab] because I feel better than I have in the last four or five years," said Schneider, who had a similar procedure performed in 1996 while with the Toronto Maple Leafs. At the time, he missed 53 games during a three-month recovery process.

The most recent surgery was much easier on him because of an advanced technique that involved going through his belly button. It allowed him to be up and walking around in less than a week.

Schneider was also able to be at home during his recovery to help his wife, Shannon, take care of their newborn daughter, Abigail, and one-year-old son, Mathieu Jr. That was the best part out of missing seven weeks, he said.

Schneider met his wife while playing for the Leafs in the mid-'90s, and Shannon has since converted to Judaism. They are raising their children as Jews.

"The more [Shannon] learned about Judaism, the more she liked it and accepted the beliefs," Schneider said. "It's really a family-oriented religion. It's a religion that's close-knit."

Schneider, one of four Jewish players currently in the NHL, said he makes sure he introduces himself to the other Jewish guys in the league.

"Any time you meet another Jew, no matter where he's from, there always seems to be a bond," he said.

FIFA urged to ignore suspension calls

By ORI LEWIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Football Association (IFA) chair Gavri Levy last week called on FIFA president Sepp Blatter to ignore pleas from Arab states to ban Israel from the world soccer organization.

"We utterly reject this proposal," Levy wrote in a letter to the head of the soccer governing body.

A week before, Jordan and Syria called on FIFA to ban Israel from playing in internationals because of the the invasion of West Bank towns by Israeli troops.

In a letter to Blatter, Prince Ali, head of the Jordan FA and brother of King Abdullah, said Israel's participation in international soccer should be put on hold.

"In order to uphold its banner of 'Fair Play,' the entire football community should freeze Israel's participation in this noble sport, in the same way it did with the former apartheid South Africa," the letter stated.

Frank Bouzo, president of the Syrian Football Federation, also wrote to Blatter, asking the international soccer body to suspend Israel, the Danish daily newspaper EkstraBladet reported on its Web site.

"We want to appeal to FIFA's executive committee to suspend Israel's FIFA membership and forbid all Israeli football activities in FIFA. Such a decision would be in harmony with FIFA's brave decision to suspend South Africa due to apartheid," the newspaper quoted Bouzo's letter as saying.

Levy urged Blatter to ignore the appeal. "I hope that you, Mr President, will brush aside any threat made on an association which has always backed FIFA and acts in accordance with sporting principles," Levy said.

Levy pointed to the fact that IFA is an independent body and is not under the influence of Israel's politicians.

"Unlike in many countries, IFA is not connected to politics and is not influenced in any way by the government or even by the sports minister."

Levy also reminded Blatter that IFA had backed the Palestinian Football Association's request to join the body. He also pointed out that 30 per cent of Israel's registered clubs hail from the Arab sector, and the Arab sector has four of the 29 delegates on IFA's management body. At least 10 others sit on various committees.

"Since our formation over 70 years ago, IFA has acted under one agenda – complete equality and mutual respect," Levi wrote.

Levi listed the names of five Israeli Arabs who have played for, or still play, on the national team: Ali Othman, Rifat Turk and Zahi Armeli, all retired, and current players Walid Badir and Najwan Grayeb.

Levy also sounded an optimistic note: "The whole world is fighting terror. In Israel terror is a stumbling block to peace. We look forward to the day the national team can play in Gaza, Cairo and Damascus. I am certain that this day will come, despite all the difficulties."

FICTION

• Azarel, by Karoly Pap, translated by Paul Olchvary, Steerforth Press, $21.95, SC.

Translated into English for the first time, this classic about a young boy's intense rebellion against his family, Judaism and God was originally published in 1937. According to George Konrad, "Azarel is among the visionary masterpieces of Hungarian Jewish literature." (The author died during the Holocaust.)

• The Collected Stories of Joseph Roth, translated by Michael Hofmann, W.W. Norton & Company, $39.99, HC.

A remarkable collection of 17 stories and novellas written by one of the greatest and most profound German writers of the 20th century. This brilliant anthology is the only work of fiction by the author of The Radetzky March that was not translated previously into English.

• My Suburban Shtetl: A Novel about Life in a Twentieth-Century Jewish-American Village, by Robert Rand, Syracuse University Press, $38.95, HC.

This interesting work of fiction by an American Jewish journalist reads more like a memoir or a report than a novel. However, it describes perfectly the way of life and thinking of the post-Holocaust American Jewish community, and captures the psychology of its members – both the survivors and the American-born.

NON-FICTION

Love and Terror in the God Encounter: The Theological Legacy of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, by Rabbi David Hartman, Jewish Lights, $38.95, HC.

Rabbi Hartman, an internationally respected theologian and winner of two national Jewish book awards, explains the writings of the revered talmudic scholar and thinker who advocated discourse between Torah study and modern existentialist philosophy and was the greatest influence on modern Orthodox Judaism in America.

• Letters to Auntie Fori: The 5,000-Year History of the Jewish People and their Faith, by Martin Gilbert, Schocken Books, $43.95, HC.

In this remarkable and touching work by one of the world's foremost authors, the history of the Jewish people and an explanation of the Jewish faith and practices are presented through Gilbert's correspondence – gathered and placed in chronological order – to this adopted aunt over many years.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am a Jewish student at a public high school. As the tension in Israel escalates, many of my Muslim classmates are criticizing Israel openly – in conversations I have with them, in the school paper and in group discussions. This makes me feel very uncomfortable, but I don't feel I can say anything because as far as I can tell, all of the other Jewish students at my school pretend they don't care (or maybe they really don't care). I think it's important for people to see both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but I am afraid that if I say something, someone will take what I say very strongly and react the wrong way. Please help me.

Concerned

Dear Concerned,

That's a very frustrating situation. Your hesitation about speaking up is understandable, but remember that even though it's not always easy to stand up for what you think is right, it is important for people to understand both sides of the issue.

The other Jewish students at your school probably feel exactly the same way you do – they do not want to speak out because of fear of harsh disagreement or hostility. It's important to show them that they can express their opinion like anybody else can. Get a group of Jewish friends together to write an article for the school newspaper. You don't even need to rampantly defend Israel – just delicately point out that there are two sides to every conflict. Or, if people are criticizing Israel unfairly, you can write an editorial criticizing their criticism.

Another thing you can do is, the next time you think you are going to be in a discussion or other situation where Israel is going to be criticized, try to make sure some of your Jewish classmates are there, too. It's possible that they just haven't really heard the way the Muslim students talk about the conflict. Once you have accumulated some strength in numbers, you'll be amazed at how much easier it will be to say, "Well, the Palestinians are at fault here too." Most high school students are willing to listen to other people's opinions. Besides, they aren't afraid to say what they think, so there's no reason whatsoever for you to be. The key is to get more people involved, and to be brave about expressing your opinion.

Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Thousands of people demonstrated on behalf of Israel in front of the Parliament buildings in Ottawa on Sunday. Inset, Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister, addresses the large gathering. [Vera Gillman photos]

'A great day to be Jewish'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Canadian Jewish community has proclaimed to the rest of Canada and to the world that Israel must, and will, continue to exist.

Estimates reached as high as 25,000 for the crowd that converged on Parliament Hill for the Israel rally April 21. Thousands of supporters from Ottawa's Jewish community were joined by people from Calgary, Hamilton, Kichener-Waterloo, Kingston, London, Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

The orderly but enthusiastic crowd sang Israeli songs of peace, led by Ottawa's Cantor Daniel Benlolo over the loudspeaker, and waved flags of Israel.

"Today is a good day for the Jews," said Gerald Levitz, president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa and master of ceremonies for the event.

"Today is a great day to be Jewish... We have come to the capital of Canada to declare our unwavering, unreserved support for Medinat Yisrael."

Cotler slams takeover of office

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler called a sit-in by seven pro-Palestinian protesters at his Montreal constituency office last week "an illegal occupation" and accused them of intimidating his staff.

Cotler, who was in Ottawa at the time, said he is concerned about the danger of the hatred in the Middle East being imported into Canada.

The four men and three women, all in their 20s, were arrested and charged with trespassing after barricading themselves in the Kent Street office. Their spokesperson, Aaron Maté, a Concordia University student who lives in the Mount Royal riding, said, "We are a group of Canadian citizens of Jewish origin and Palestinian origin who are opposed to what our government is supporting in Israel."

The group said they were protesting Israel's treatment of the Palestinians, adding that they want Canada to take a tougher stand against what they consider Israel's violation of human rights. Maté, who is Jewish, said he wanted Cotler to indicate whether he is prepared to uphold the standards of human rights he has upheld in the past.

Cotler is on leave as a professor of law from McGill University and has been a rights activist internationally for many years.

It is "ironic because we are commemorating the 20th anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms including the celebration of speech and the values of a free and democratic society like Canada's" said Cotler at a press conference.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Slamming Svend

VANCOUVER — More than 30 people gathered recently at the provincial headquarters of the New Democratic Party to protest MP Svend Robinson's recent attempt to visit Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat. They carried signs saying "No tax dollars for terror," and "What's next, Svend? A visit to Osama's cave?" Organizer Rabbi Ross Singer of Shaarey Tefillah Synagogue called Robinson's visit "morally repugnant and reprehensible."

BQ Trade Idea

OTTAWA — A Bloc Quebecois backbencher has proposed amendments to the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement to exclude all items originating in "Jewish settlements." Pierre Paquette says the purpose of his private member's bill is to exclude products that are classified by the Israelis as Israeli in origin but in fact originate from Jewish settlements in the post-1967 territories, including eastern Jerusalem. He told the House of Commons earlier this month that his proposal "is entirely consistent with Canada's policy of not recognizing the occupation of these territories since 1967. I seek the support of all the parties and of all members of this House to pass it speedily, given the current situation in the Middle East."

ISRAEL

Israel's Population

JERUSALEM — On its 54th Independence Day, Israel's population totals 6.5 million. According to the Central Bureau of Statistics, the population has increased eightfold since 1948. Of the 5.3 million Jews, 63 per cent are natives and the rest are immigrants. Israel accounts for 37 per cent of the world's Jewish population, compared to only six per cent in 1948.

'No Greater Honour'

JERUSALEM — PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's wife has endorsed Palestinian suicide attacks. In an interview with a London-based Arabic weekly, Suha Arafat said that if she had a son, there would be "no greater honour" than to sacrifice him for the Palestinian cause. She and her daughter are currently living in Paris.

WORLD

Kiev 'Pogrom'

KIEV — About 50 youths attacked the central synagogue here last week, beating three people, hurling bottles and breaking windows. Among those injured in the attack was the head of Kiev's yeshiva, Rabbi Tzvi Kaplan, who was knocked to the ground and beaten with stones. The 13-year-old son of Kiev Chief Rabbi Moshe Azman and a security guard were also injured. Rabbi Azman said the mob marched down Kiev's main boulevard shouting "Kill the Jews!" before attacking the synagogue. "I call this act a pogrom," he said.

B-Ball Apology

VILNIUS — A Lithuanian sports association has apologized to the country's Jewish community for anti-Semitic slogans chanted by fans during a basketball game last month against an Israeli team. Some spectators dressed up as PA Chairman Yasser Arafat and waved Palestinian flags, and some chanted "Jews get out!"

Chechens Sentenced

MOSCOW — A court has sentenced 12 Chechens to between five and 10 years in prison for kidnapping a 12-year-old Israeli boy in 1999. Adi Sharon, son of an Israeli businessman, was held for more than nine months in a small, dark pit after his abduction from Moscow, and badly beaten. He was freed in 2000 in the city of Penza, 800 kilometres east of Moscow.

Rabbi's Trial

NEW YORK — The trial of a rabbi accused of sexually molesting teenagers is slated to begin June 3 in Freehold, N.J. Rabbi Baruch Lanner faces charges of sexually assaulting two girls at a high school where he was principal. If convicted, Lanner faces up to 40 years in jail.

Catholic Bishops Comment on Mideast

OTTAWA — The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has released a statement on the Mideast crisis. It reads, in part:

"It is with great sadness and concern that the Catholic Bishops of Canada watch the conflict in the Middle East worsen.

"War never leads to peace. Terrorism is the blindest and most unacceptable attack against human life, too often directed against those who are innocent and defenseless. To sabotage peace is also an attack, against the dignity of the people trapped in the conflict, while the hesitations of the international community undermine the credibility of those very institutions that are supposed to promote and maintain peace.

"This land that has become a battleground is nevertheless the Holy Land, a place sacred to three great monotheistic faiths. Both its peoples have the right to live in security and harmony, in mutual respect and recognition. They also have a need to be governed wisely, in order to bring irrational extremism and radical factions under control and to diminish the murderous acts of violence...

"We implore the government of Canada to undertake the necessary initiatives for ending the war and risking peace in the Middle East, thus preventing a widening of the conflict and favouring a return to negotiations on the basis of United Nations resolutions as well as the Madrid and Oslo accords that held out so much hope for peace."

Canadians blame Arafat, Saddam & Saudis

Poll commissioned by BBC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An "overwhelming majority" of Canadians – 80 per cent – see no moral distinction between attacks on the World Trade Center and suicide bombing attacks on Israeli civilians, according to pollster Conrad Winn of COMPAS.

Speaking last week at a press conference at the office of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), which commissioned the poll on Canadian Opinion on the Arab-Israeli Conflict, Winn noted that there is a "moderate difference" in attitude among francophones compared to anglophones. However, only 66 per cent of French speakers agree that the two types of attacks were essentially alike, while 84 per cent of the English speakers held that view.

The poll also reflected a majority view holding Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, Iraqi president Saddam Hussein and the Saudis responsible for Arab-Israeli tensions. Overall, 74 per cent agree that Arafat is a terrorist with no sense of remorse, but, again, French speakers are less likely to hold that view.

Differences also appeared according to political party affiliation. NDPers were least likely to agree, said Winn, but even there there was a majority.

Only about half of those surveyed (48 per cent) said Israel's military response was just right (24 per cent) or too restrained (24 per cent). Fifty-two per cent said Israel's military response ought to be more restrained.

Winn suggested that francophone attitudes on military issues reflect "a pattern consistent with a century of greater pacifism" whereas their position vis-a-vis Jews and Israel was related to their "history of being less comfortable with ethnoracial minorities.

"You can argue that francophones have greater misgivings about minorities including Jews but not exclusive to Jews," Winn said. "Given that history of misgivings, there is less of a sympathy with Israel."

The poll was intended to test to what extent people share the interpretation of events held by B'nai Brith, said Winn.

The results will be used as a point of reference in discussions with government, said Frank Dimant, BBC's executive director. "Seventy-four per cent of Canadians deem Arafat to be a terrorist. That is something our government has to be cognizant of."

RALLY IN D.C.:

Over 700 Canadians joined the rally in Washington D.C. to show their support for Israel on April 15. Among them were, from left, Aliza Klein, Brenda Weizner, Amaris Siegel.

Yom Hazikaron in Israel

At precisely 8 p.m., sirens sound throughout the city. I am in Jerusalem on the eve of Yom Hazikaron, Remembrance Day. Everyone in the restaurant stands up and remains standing for at least three minutes. The sirens summon us to officially remember the 21,181 people who have fallen in defence of the country since 1948.

Israel can be better understood when we see how its citizens observe Yom Hazikaron.

In my hotel room afterward, I flip through the television channels and come across the broadcast of a memorial service. The IDF's chief of staff, Shaul Mofaz, wearing his crimson paratroopers beret, both for religious and ceremonial reasons I assume, is reading a poem. I did not hear the introduction to the poem, but I believe it is a poem written by a soldier whose memory and life are now being recalled. I cannot imagine the chief of the Canadian armed forces or the American armed forces reading a poem at a public ceremony.

At the conclusion of the poem, a young man and woman sing "At Tishma Koli:" You will hear my voice. It is a deeply affecting poem, made even more so by the fact that it followed upon the poem read by the chief of staff. There is no differentiation between the legitimacy of the high-ranking soldier and "ordinary" singers reading their elegies. All are citizens; all are soldiers.

On another channel is the telecast of short, biographical sketches of the lives of soldiers who have been killed serving the nation. These sketches, I subsequently find out, started in the evening and continued throughout the following day until sundown.

Each story lasts between 15 and 30 minutes. It combines photo images with interviews from surviving family, friends and colleagues. In many cases, the soldiers whose lives are being recounted were barely out of their teen years, if at all.

One story is that of a young pilot who died in a training accident. His parents relate anecdotes from their son's short life. The moments on camera are poignant, the grief still so fresh, still so painful.

The father breaks down as he recalls a time when he took his son, then just out of kindergarten, to an amusement park. They spent the entire day in the playground, going on rides, playing with animals and feasting on snacks. As they were going home, the young boy asked his father for yet another ice cream bar, by then his third or fourth. Father, trying to make a parental point about moderation and limits, refused to buy another ice cream. The youngster objected to what he determined was an arbitrary ruling and told his father in the authoritative way that eight-year-olds occasionally muster: You don't know how to be a father!

At the time, it was an amusing moment for father and son. The father smiled when he recalled the moment, but repeating the young child's words, he began to cry. His wife, sitting beside him, took his hand. She cried too.

In another place, another context, another culture, such television programming, would be an intrusion into the family's unhealed wound. But here, one family's suffering is the entire nation's suffering. The country needs to see and to know who its fallen children are. And thus, in a profound way, not as a matter of sloganeering, but as a matter of very real empathy, the fallen soldiers have become the fallen children of the entire country.

The vulnerability of one is the vulnerability of all. Everyone knows this and acts accordingly. Publicizing or sharing the sadness does not diffuse it; rather, it makes of millions of families, one family.

The following day, I sit in the picnic area beside the Castel monument. The Castel is a fortress, as its name suggests, that once controlled the highway from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. In 1948, fully 10 per cent of the Yishuv, 60,000 out of 600,000 people, lived in Jerusalem. David Ben-Gurion understood the deep spiritual, symbolic and strategic significance of retaining Jerusalem in Jewish hands. He was prepared to do so at all costs.

Thus, he was determined to break the siege the Arabs had imposed on Jerusalem. Breaking that siege meant capturing the Castel, which the Palmach eventually did, but after many days of hard fighting and many dead.

Many of the soldiers who fell at the Castel are buried at the cemetery of Kiryat Anavim, a kibbutz only minutes away. I attended the memorial service there.

The grounds are crowded. Most of the visitors are family members of people who are buried in the cemetery. But there are many schoolchildren, and others, who, like us, are there simply to pay our respects to the dead and to the day.

At 11 a.m., a siren sounds. Everyone stands completely still, though it is hot, even in the shade of the well-wooded grounds.

The keynote speaker was Minister of Culture and Sports, Matan Vilna'i. In a deep, sonorous voice, he told the assembly that "it is forbidden to lose our hope." He was referring to the current "situation." He compared favourably the soldiers of today with those who died liberating Jerusalem.

The "situation" has affected people's moods and public behaviour. But no threat or perceived threat could keep Israelis away from crowding the country's cemeteries that day.

The motto of the day was displayed everywhere: in shop windows, on buses and public billboards: To the drivers of public buses, to our security and rescue forces, the heart says: Thank you.

Mideast Crisis: The Homefront

Albright favours return to Camp David proposals

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The proposals presented by Israel at the Camp David summit almost two years ago should be revived, Madeleine Albright, the former U.S. secretary of state, suggested here last week.

"The ideas of Camp David need to be resurrected," she said in a speech to The Junior League of Toronto. "They're logical."

At Camp David, then Israeli prime minister, Ehud Barak, broadly offered Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat statehood in exchange for an end to the conflict. The Palestinians rejected Barak's terms, and shortly afterward, the current intifadah broke out.

"We came very close to a solution at Camp David," claimed Albright, who was intimately involved in the deliberations.

A key member of former U.S. president Bill Clinton's administration, Albright was secretary of state – the first woman to fill that position – from 1997 to 2001. She was also the United States' representative at the United Nations.

Briefly outlining her vision of peace, Albright said any future agreement should be based on a two-state solution encompassing such core problems as Jerusalem's final status and the Palestinian refugees.

"There is a way to solve the Jerusalem problem," she said.

In a reference to the "right of return," the Palestinian demand that Arab refugees be allowed to return to their former homes in what is now Israel, Albright said this issue can also be resolved.

But she added that Israel has a right to determine its own immigration policy.

Albright urged her successor, Colin Powell, to return to the Mideast. Powell spent nine days in the region recently in an unsuccessful bid to hammer out a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians.

Madeleine Albright

The United States has an obligation to try to defuse the current tension, which she described as dismaying.

"The bomb throwers are on the rampage and the peacemakers have been thrown off the stage," she said in sombre tones.

Warning of further fighting, she said the violence will grow worse if nothing is done to staunch it.

Nevertheless, war in the Mideast is not inevitable, she noted.

Albright said that Israel's occupation of the territories cannot last. "Even Israel's most hawkish leaders must know that the occupation must end."

She also criticized the Palestinians for using terrorism as a means by which to achieve political goals.

In a critique of U.S. President George W. Bush's "hands-off" Mideast policy, Albright charged he had let the Arab-Israeli dispute fester.

If she had been secretary of state today, she would have gone to the Mideast long ago, Albright said.

Nor, she said, would she have dismantled Clinton's special Mideast peacemaking team, headed by Dennis Ross, an experienced diplomat of encyclopedic knowledge.

Quoting Israel's former foreign minister, Abba Eban, Albright said Arafat has "never missed an opportunity to miss an opportunity."

Arafat reacts to situations and, furthermore, is incapable of making fundamental decisions related to the peace process, she said. Nonetheless, he is the leader of the Palestinians.

By isolating Arafat in his besieged compound in Ramallah, she warned, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has inadvertently turned him into a "super martyr" and hero.

"Sharon has chosen the wrong tactic."

She is very troubled by "these two old men," who, she charged, are not doing what they should for their people.

Turning to a related topic, Albright said the United States has an obligation to ensure that weapons of mass destruction do not fall into the hands of terrorists.

"It would be better if [Iraqi leader] Saddam Hussein would not be there," she said, adding that now is not the time to unseat him.

Albright praised Bush for toppling Afghanistan's Taliban regime, the patron of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network.

But she called Bush's "axis of evil" slogan, lumping Iraq, Iran and North Korea together, as simplistic and misleading.

She predicted the war against international terrorism will not end any time soon.

"We're in this for the long haul, and we'll need the help of all our friends."

Complimenting Canada for its support, she said, "You can be proud of the role Canadian troops played in Afghanistan."

In its efforts to isolate Islamic radicals, who were behind the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, Washington must press Pakistan and Saudi Arabia to reform their respective school systems, Albright said.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We wish to inform the Jewish community that until further notice, Benjamin's will withhold its daily advertisement from the Births & Deaths page of The Toronto Star. Families may continue to place notices in the obituary listings of any newspaper in Toronto. Full details of all Benjamin's funeral arrangements, shivas and unveilings will appear in The National Post and our website (www.benjamins.ca).

This decision is based on what we believe to be The Toronto Star's biased language and coverage of the conflict in the middle east. We believe that the reporting and opinion columns try to 'balance' two sides of the story without sufficient depth to achieve journalism's ideals of truth and justice. This in our view makes The Toronto Star complicit in anti-Israel and anti-Semitic attitudes and actions towards the Jewish community in Toronto.

As long as The Toronto Star distorts the truth by equating the deaths of suicidal "martyrs" with those of the Israelis they kill, and as long as The Toronto Star allows its bias to incite hatred of the Jewish community in Toronto and State of Israel, we will not support their advertising revenues.

As leaders with an 80-year heritage of serving the Jewish community, Benjamin's feels duty bound to resist all forms of hatred against our people.

We appreciate your understanding and support.

Mideast Crisis: The Homefront

Leaders laud Canada's voting record at UN

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

In a shift from years past, Jewish community leaders praised Canada's recent voting pattern at the United Nations in their April 15 meeting with Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham.

The hour-long meeting was "cordial and friendly," said Canadian Jewish Congress national president Keith Landy. Mainly, it was an opportunity for the community to thank Canada for voting against two anti-Israel resolutions at the UN's Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR).

Canada opposed a measure to send an urgent fact-finding mission to the West Bank to investigate human rights abuses, and voted against a resolution that condemned Israel for carrying out "mass killings" in Palestinian areas.

Even though both Arab-sponsored resolutions passed, Canada was lauded in Jewish circles for opposing them, and for taking a leadership role at the commission.

Before the commission's six-week annual meeting began in Geneva, Israel asked Canada to "be our voice" at the gathering, mainly because the United States had been thrown off the body by the Arab bloc.

Israel not only asked Canada to oppose measuring condemning the Jewish State, but also to force votes on them to avoid the appearance they were passed unanimously.

That appeal from Israel seems to have gotten through, said Landy. Indeed, Canada called for votes on at least two of the resolutions.

Asked whether Canada has heeded Israel's entreaty, Landy said, "No question about it. In fact, the message has gotten through since [last summer's anti-racism conference in] Durban." Graham, said Landy seems to have had "a very good connection" with Israel's deputy foreign minister, Rabbi Michael Melchior, with whom Graham held talks prior to the Geneva meeting.

In all, Canada opposed two of the resolutions, voted for two others and abstained on one. Observers noted, however, that Canada's explanation of its votes contained language that, for the first time, noted the unfair singling out of Israel and the lack of a balanced assessment of the current crisis.

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said the Jewish leaders thanked Graham for Canada's voting at the UNCHR, and for the shift in Canada's overall language relating to Israel.

"Canada has made a conscious effort to move slightly closer to the U.S. position," Wilder said. "We like that."

He also noted that Canadians on the world stage are no longer using terms such as "moral equivalence" and "cycle of violence" to describe the current crisis, signalling a possible change in Canada's Mideast policy.

Landy said the Jewish leaders told Graham that a "permanent change" is needed in how anti-Israel resolutions are introduced at the UN in the first place.

Landy said items on the agenda at the meeting included the global, as well as domestic, surge in anti-Semitism. "We raised specifically the importance for there to be a clear government denunciation of vandalism, and that that should be conveyed to the prime minister."

An issue raised with Graham, Landy said, has been the government's failure to end the fund-raising activities of Hezbollah. So far, Ottawa has banned fund-raising just for Hezbollah's military wing, but not for its social and civilian arm. The United States, by contrast, has banned all fund-raising by Hezbollah.

"For some reason," Landy said, "Canada is seeking additional information" on the situation.

Canada's "double standard" of calling for Israel to withdraw from Palestinian territories, while Ottawa continues its presence in Afghanistan, was also raised, Landy said.

Wilder noted the message relayed to Graham was that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat will be prodded into negotiations "only when the whole world, especially the Europeans, gang up on him."

In statements, B'nai Brith Canada applauded Graham, saying Canada's voting trend at the UN is "heartening" to Canadian Jews. But the organization also said it was reiterating its call to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, with "grave disappointment and deep concern," to condemn the recent spate of anti-Semitic acts in the country.

Donations keep coming in for Associated ambulance drive

TORONTO — As of last week, Associated Hebrew Day School's Read-for-a-need program had raised $94,000 and donations were still coming in.

The project was launched to encourage students to read while raising money for much-needed ambulances in Israel (see CJN story, April 18).

Although the program was supposed to end last month, money is still coming in, said Randy Spiegel, Associated's director of public relations, adding that the school is hoping to reach $100,000. The project's initial goal was $71,000, the amount needed for a new ambulance for Magen David Adom.

"The support from this community has been outstanding," Spiegel said, adding that young and old have been contributing. "The kids themselves have been collecting from sponsors as well as giving from their own allowances."

CLARIFICATION: According to Canadian Magen David Adom, the actual cost of an ambulance is $81,500. For further information, call 416-780-0034.

Just the beginning

At the 54th anniversary of the independence of the State of Israel, the mood of the majority of its people is a four-cornered complex of swirling emotions: relief, determination, betrayal and resolve. Israelis are relieved that their government finally abandoned its policy of restraint toward the terrorists and the terrorists' infrastructure. The slaughter on leil seder, the religious holiday of Pesach night – not to mention the four suicide bombings that followed in quick succession during the same holiday – was the proverbial straw that broke the people's back. "The government has finally started to fight back," so many people in Israel recently told The CJN.

Israelis are also determined that Yasser Arafat, his advisors and his militia will no longer plan, approve, encourage, incite or execute attacks against Jews with impunity. Israel will exercise the very same rights and meet the very same obligations that fall upon all governments in the world, namely, to defend the lives of its citizens.

That a large segment of western media, most of Europe, and the Second and Third World portray Israel as a criminal and rogue state, some even using Nazi imagery, leaves Israelis feeling betrayed.

However the feeling of betrayal has spawned only a deeper resolve among the people that they will not acquiesce to the hypocrisy and blatant unfairness that condemns Israel at every turn, exculpates the Palestinian Authority and provides fertile ground for a renascent ugly anti-Semitism.

In recent days, the Jews of the Diaspora have gathered by the thousands in their respective communities, in solidarity with Israel. We must see this as just the beginning. Israel needs us to be at its side, steadfast, a collective antidote to the toxic lies and distortions that are flowing increasingly into the mainstream poisoning minds away from the truth.

Freedom's highest price

Along with all Canadians, we mourn the deaths of Sgt. Marc Léger, Cpl. Ainsworth Dyer, Pte. Richard Green and Pte. Nathan Smith, who died last week in Afghanistan, killed by the "friendly fire" of an ally. It is an oxymoronic term, friendly fire. Like all clinical terminology, it is designed only to categorize rather than to explain. It speaks to the intent of the brutal act, but is silent, as all such terminologies must ultimately be, to the effect.

But that effect, we know, is the abrupt, nightmarish, devastating, irreplaceable loss of a person deeply loved. No words can ever explain or describe that loss; nor can they abate something so unabatable. To the families and friends of the men who died, we convey our heartfelt condolences. They died on a field so far away, defending us, literally, in Canada. They paid freedom's highest price. It is a debt we will always owe them, but alas, will never be able to repay. We pray their memories will be for blessing.

World indifferent to anti-Semitism

Montreal MP Irwin Cotler recently noted that the "human rights" agenda has now become a mask for anti-Jewish expression. His observation was particularly timely, given the decision by the UN Human Rights Commission, whose antipathy to Israel is well-documented, to send a "fact-finding mission" to the Middle East.

Interesting, isn't it, that "human rights" groups and "peace" activists seem to be concerned almost exclusively with the fate of the Palestinians in the current crisis, while paying virtually no attention to Israeli casualties.

Of course, Adolf Hitler didn't consider Jews "humans" either, and he also always stated that if not for the aggression launched against civilization by international Jewry, the world would be at peace. Many leftists in the past, too, were hostile to Jews – after all, one famous 19th-century quip described anti-Semitism as "the socialism of fools."

Here in Canada, the indifference to Jewish concerns extends to the domestic scene as well. The recent arson at Anshei Minsk Synagogue in Toronto and the vandalism at Temple Israel in Ottawa passed with hardly a word of notice in the national media. Only with the third attack, an arson at Congregation Agudas Israel in Saskatoon, did the media pay attention. And even then, few will call it anti-Semitism. Imagine if any of this had happened to a mosque – the outcry denouncing such vandalism as racist would have been heard immediately across the land, from the prime minister on down.

Avoid use of guilt

Regarding David Freudmann's letter in the CJN issue of March 27 ("No one basks in compliments"), let's stop laying a guilt trip on Jews who are afraid to visit Israel now, given that Jews there are being blown up or shot nearly every day, both in public and private locations, in major cities and small towns.

The Torah says with regard to mitzvot, "You may live by them," and the rabbinic tradition adds, "and not die by them." The Torah also says, "For your own sake, be most careful," which means, according to tradition, that one need not expose oneself to avoidable danger. There are plenty of other ways to support Israel: buying Israeli products, investing in Israeli companies, giving to tzedakah, lobbying world governments and media on Israel's behalf. Those who wish to visit should be encouraged to do so, but let's not be harsh on those who choose not to at this time. Above all, let us pray for calm to be restored throughout our homeland.

Let us join together and keep rallying

As a Canadian Jew who was born and raised in Israel, I attended the March 24th rally for Israel at Mel Lastman Square. The event felt like a roller coaster ride and brought up a lot of emotions – sadness, joy and hope for a brighter future. What we take for granted in Canada, people of Israel consider a dream: a dream and a wish for a nation without fear and the need to continually defend its place in the global community.

Although I represent only one voice, I believe that we all need to realize that we live in a global community. Actions and attitudes of one affect us all. Peace is everyone's responsibility – we cannot take it for granted. The Sept. 11 attacks in New York and Washington were a global tragedy. People who lost their lives in the World Trade Centre were of different colours, religions and nationalities. War hurts everyone, directly or indirectly.

During the rally, we stood united to express our solidarity for Israel during these difficult times. We listened, we cried, we chanted in joy and hope "L'shnah habah b'Yerushalayim." The sense of togetherness and shared pain was absolutely incredible.

Rallies are a means of expressions of our concern and identity. They bring people together for a common goal, and they allow people to join hands with likeminded people and to let others know that the cause is real. By choosing not to participate, we only ignore the problem. This is not to criticize anyone but to unite Jews of all backgrounds during this time of crisis. Let's build a better future for our children. Let us unite and let the world know that we are serious about peace. Your voice matters – let it be heard.

Boycott French goods

Anti-semitism in France is nothing new. It's been far more prevalent there than in any other western European country since World War II. So it comes as no surprise that since the current escalation of violence in the Middle East, virulent incidents of vandalism, arson and anti-Jewish protest have risen sharply.

According to a recent Newsweek article, the French ambassador in London, Daniel Bernard, was quoted calling Israel "that shitty little country." The article went on to say that Jean Le Pen, a long-time xenophobic anti-Semite, is expected to garner 10 per cent of the popular vote in the upcoming election for the presidency. Imagine: one person in 10 is in favour of an anti-Semite to preside over France. Pretty scary stuff!

Jews worldwide should boycott all French goods. Organize through your shul, by word of mouth or through any other Jewish organization. Together we can send a message to France that their view of Jews and Isreal will not be tolerated. If you can live without such French imports as frogs' legs, snails and tree fungus, you'll be OK. And great wines are produced all over the world these days.

If you believe in this message... pass it on. It won't be long before we are a force far greater than one in 10.

Israel's and Canada's histories deeply intertwined

The following is the second part of a two-part article. Part 1 was published last week.

By JOHN ROSS

Of the 11 members (Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, India, Guatemala, Iran, Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay and Yugoslavia) who served on the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), Justice Ivan Rand of Canada became the leading implementer of the Zionist dream for a separate independent Jewish state in Palestine.

Rand's role in UNSCOP was quite remarkable because Canada and the United Kingdom (U.K.) had hoped that Rand would recognize that the Balfour Declaration was the source of the problems in Palestine. The decision they had expected from Rand and his fellow UNSCOP members was a final recommendation to simply "amend" the terms of the British Mandate by formalizing the Jewish immigration restrictions set out in the White Paper to be official United Nations (UN) policy.

Such a measure, they believed, would help deflect criticism from the British government and place it upon the UN, thereby allowing the British to continue enforcing their decision to restrict Jewish immigration into Palestine.

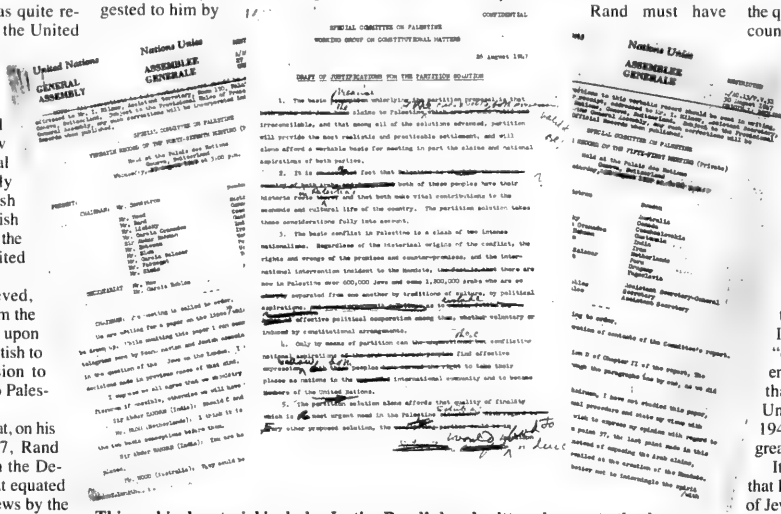
It was therefore no accident that, on his way to Palestine in June 1947, Rand received a briefing report from the Department of External Affairs that equated the annihilation of six million Jews by the Nazis to the killing of 800,000 Muslims by the Mongols in Baghdad in 1258. Not only did this memorandum state that it was "futile" to determine whether the Jews or the Arabs had suffered the most, it also suggested that any solution for Palestine must recognize the need to rebuild Islamic culture from the devastation inflicted upon it in the 13th century.

Nor were the words of the British High Commissioner in Palestine unintentional when he advised the UNSCOP members that the thorny issue of immigration into Palestine would soon pass because Jews would not want to immigrate to Palestine once they had been settled in other countries around the world.

Yet a few weeks later, when the UNSCOP members had left Palestine and had gone to Geneva, Switzerland, to write their report, Rand distanced himself from the views of the Canadian and British governments. He saw himself as a member of a committee of the UN and accountable only to the UN rather than as a delegate of a country.

On Aug. 6, 1947, Rand prepared his own memorandum for a solution to the problems in Palestine, advocating partition and the establishment of an independent Jewish state. Over the next three weeks, he gradually convinced a majority of the committee members to adopt this position and to give control over the Negev to the Jewish state. He also singlehandedly and successfully opposed the anti-partition members who challenged the validity of the Balfour Declaration as the primary basis for the British Mandate. And he reaffirmed the legality of the Balfour Declaration and suggested it was the White Paper of 1939, with its restrictive limits on Jewish immigration, that was the illegal document and the real source of the problems in Palestine.

What caused Rand to so forcefully renounce the political line suggested to him by the Canadian and British governments, and to echo the words of David Ben-Gurion and Chaim Weizmann in their addresses to UNSCOP? It is difficult to find the exact moment when he decided to follow the Zionist position, as this would normally be an exercise in pure speculation. But having read his private correspondence, I would argue that the primary influence on his decision was the contact and correspondence he had with Jews living in Palestine.



This archival material includes Justice Rand's handwritten changes to the documents that eventually led to the creation of Israel.

Unlike the other UNSCOP members who were isolated and cooped up away from the "rank and file of Palestine," Rand was invited to many social engagements. He was also extended every kindness from the Jews of Palestine. This was especially true of those Jews who had emigrated from Canada. Their letters to Rand as a "fellow countryman" reflect the sincere graciousness and warm hospitality that epitomized the noble ideals and principles of Zionism. Most importantly, they succeeded in exposing the fallacy that lay behind the anti-partition positions of the British High Commissioner and Canadian External Affairs.

One of Rand's first letters was from Moshe Novomeysky of Upper Talbieh, Jerusalem, who was the directing manager of Palestine Potash Ltd., a public company that had the concession for processing chemicals from the Dead Sea. He thanked Rand for the pleasurable exchange of views they had while spending the afternoon together at the Dead Sea, and asked if they could meet again. One of the leading industrialists of Palestine, Novomeysky planned to build a railway to the Mediterranean. He was also a member of the "Brandeis group," an economic corporation that had been guided by former Justice Louis Brandeis of the U.S. Supreme Court to invest in Palestine. Rand must have been a most interested audience because, prior to his appointment to the Canadian Supreme Court, he was lead counsel for Canadian National Railways and was deeply involved in many capital projects of this nature.

Rand also received a letter from Bernard Joseph of Rehavia, Jerusalem, a Canadian lawyer who left Montreal in 1922 to immigrate to Palestine and who became a leading member of the Palestine bar. This letter explains the significance of Rand's interest in the Palestine Economic Corporation as Joseph wrote to Rand that he was "interested to read in the Palestine Post that you recently published as essay on the late Brandeis whose friendship I had the privilege of enjoying." Rand was quite an admirer of Brandeis, who was a fellow graduate of Harvard Law School and who specialized in business and commercial law. It is most interesting to note the remarkable similarities between these two justices, as their careers, their commitment to higher education and their social activism on the bench for which they both became famous mirror each other in virtually every respect.

From the collective settlement of Ein Hashofet came a letter from Ms. M. Bloomstone. She warmly invited Rand, as a fellow Canadian, to visit her on the 10th anniversary celebrations of her settlement that was located in the quiet hills of Ephraim. A letter similar in nature arrived from Molly Lyons Bar-David, who, in her own charming and inimitable way, invited Rand to Beth Mamoud at Arnona, Jerusalem, to share in their Shabbat. In extending her heartfelt hospitality, she wrote about her birthplace in Tisdale, Saskatchewan, and proceeded to list some names in the Canadian legal profession in order that Rand might not think her a "terrorist." But most importantly, she addressed the question of why Jews emigrate from free countries such as Canada to Palestine. The answer, she explained, was that "I couldn't resist the challenge of Palestine and couldn't divorce myself from the fate of my people in Europe, nor ignore the implications of both; this, despite the fact that I was happy in Canada and (except for isolated occurrences and childhood sorry memories) was in no need for personal salvation."

All of these letters showed Rand the personal and human side of Zionism, and undoubtedly made him much more sensitive and receptive to the need for an independent Jewish state. If these Canadian acts of "kindness" or "chesed" were indeed the spark that enabled Rand to write the UNSCOP report that set the wheel in motion toward the United Nations resolution of November 1947, then all Canadian Jewry can take great satisfaction.

It would be a serious mistake to believe that Rand's concern for improving the lives of Jews ceased after he helped to initiate the creation of the State of Israel. In 1950, he wrote and delivered the landmark decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that struck down restrictive covenants that had prevented land from being sold to Jews. The case of Noble and Wolf v. Alley was an appeal from a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal that had ruled in favour of discrimination against Jews in respect to private property rights. But Rand refused to let stand the argument from the respondent's counsel, who claimed that "his client's property would depreciate in value if Jews were allowed in as owners." Stopping counsel in mid-speech, Rand said, "If Albert Einstein and Arthur Rubinstein purchased cottages there, the property values would increase, and the associatjon should be honoured to have them as neighbours."

Rand was a true friend to the Jews of Israel and of Canada. Given the momentous importance of the two contemporaneous and courageous decisions that helped us at home and abroad, we should recognize the fact that the history of Israel and Canada may be far more intertwined than we will ever know.

More about pessimism

I recently shared with my readers the profound pessimism that has possessed me in my analysis of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. While for a long time, I seemed to be rather isolated in this regard, I now note that others, too, are taking a similar point of view.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It is my profound belief that there will be no peace in the Middle East until the Muslim/Arab world is ready to recognize the legitimacy of Israel – in any form or fashion. Unfortunately, I see no sign on the horizon that this is about to happen in the foreseeable future. There was a Saudi plan to this effect a few weeks ago, but we have not heard of it lately, most likely because it has been shelved.

I have said this before and I will repeat it: Israel can stand on its head and fulfil all the demands made of it – however unreasonable they might be – but it will not matter. The only way in which it can satisfy its neighbours is to disappear, and that desire, fortunately, does not and will not exist. Which means that the conflict will go on.

When and how Arabs will convince themselves that Israel is here to stay, I cannot foretell. I am afraid, however, that it will take some time – until a new generation has been raised that is willing to recognize the reality of Israel as a permanent feature in the Middle East. Without this, conflict will continue in one form or another – more violent at one time and less so at another. But peace is not the absence of conflict. It is an acknowledgement that all sides have a legitimate right to exist, and that acknowledgement has been absent in the past and is, unfortunately, not on the horizon in the near future.

I have held this pessimistic view for a long time, and I will be the first one to be happy when my prognosis is overturned by events and my pessimism is proven wrong.

But this column is not meant to make the readers feel good; its main purpose is to convey my opinion with regard to the state of the Jewish world. I wish that I could see signs that would allow me to abandon my pessimism and replace it with an optimistic view.

Halevai – I wish it would indeed come to pass.

What is the proper name for this?

The jury may still be out on what name to give this bloody mess but there is now little doubt among Israelis as to what the country is up against. It looks like war, sounds like war, feels like war and, with the terrible number of civilian and military casualties mounting, it certainly hurts like war.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Israel is at war, pure and simple. It may be an unconventional war with no agreed upon name, but it is war just the same, no less hellish than traditional military conflicts. And to think that the worst may be still to come…

War, so much part of the country's past, pervades the present. Never before has war hit so many Israelis so painfully, so insidiously, so indiscriminately, so close to home. Yet for quite a while, many people seemed in denial, not seeing the feud with the Palestinians for what it had become.

If anyone was still unsure whether the country was actually at war, the recent mobilization of 30,000 reservists and hundreds of tanks deployed in the West Bank (and along the northern border) should have dispelled any lingering illusions.

This was not supposed to be. Not according to the Oslo Accords that Israel and the Palestinians signed in Washington, D.C., in September 1993. The famous handshake between the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on the White House lawn was to have paved the way for a new, improved Middle East. How distant those days now seem. Sadly, the peace process that Oslo ushered in proved more process than peace.

In recent weeks, the process has been one of escalating war as hostilities reached a new level of ferocity. The month of March was especially brutal, the worst in Israeli history in terms of Palestinian attacks on soldiers and civilians, of which 125 were killed.

Each Israeli has their own take on when the unrest that erupted in September 2000 degenerated into war. The right, which had long warned of an armed conflict with the Palestinians, was quick to call the violence part of a larger, more ominous campaign. They even gave it a name, the Oslo War, since they believe it was the result of the Oslo Accords.

The left generally took longer to see the violence as an armed conflict. Some even referred cynically to IDF actions as the War to Defend the Settlements, as if soldiers were primarily protecting controversial Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

From the outset, the Palestinians christened their struggle the Al Aqsa Intifadah in honour of the Islamic holy site on Jerusalem's Temple Mount where rioting broke out 19 months ago. Since then, they have portrayed their fighting as their war of independence for a Palestinian state.

Most of the media, especially the foreign press, have avoided using the term "war." They prefer "intifadah." It's catchy, colourful and, as it means "uprising" in Arabic, suggests a nobler backdrop to Palestinian violence.

There is nothing noble about the Palestinians' war of terror, whose obscene violence has killed some 450 Israelis, wounded thousands and deeply traumatized the society.

The other day, when I wrote the first draft of this column, I began with a lament that I was reduced to being thankful that Israel had just gone more than a week without suffering a terrorist attack. I explained that I shuddered to think what might still happen between the time I sent in my column and when it would be printed a week later.

Sure enough, within an hour, the column was obsolete. A Palestinian suicide bomber struck a bus near Haifa, killing eight. Two days later, another terrorist killed six people in a bombing in central Jerusalem.

As I write this, Israel is preparing to mark its 54th Independence Day. It is anything but a happy birthday. Apart from the nation's children, few people are in the mood to celebrate, because of all the sorrow from Palestinian atrocities and fear of those still to come. We have Nobel Peace laureate Yasser Arafat to thank for that.

Readers can contact Robert Sarner at rsarner@netvision.net.il.

The return of Israeli grit

On our 54th Independence Day, Israeli Jews are again united, mobilized and determined in way that is reminiscent of the 1950s and '60s. The self-doubt and self-deprecation, expressed in the post-Zionist fad of the affluent 1990s, is gone. Instead, patriotism is back in fashion, with far more cars and buildings decorated with Israeli flags than in previous years.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Israel Defence Forces' operation to eradicate terrorism, launched after the Passover seder massacre in Netanya, has generated broad support, similar to the American support for the war against Al Qaeda after Sept. 11. High school students who might have gone to peace demonstrations or rock concerts a few years ago are now collecting gift baskets for soldiers fighting Palestinian terrorists in Jenin and Ramallah. In reserve units, the turnout is over 100 per cent, with many volunteers showing up to fight with their buddies and for their families.

Despite some losses in the hand-to-hand fighting to locate and destroy the explosives factories scattered in the Palestinian cities, morale in the IDF is very high, and the successes are beyond expectations. Key terrorists have been captured and interrogated, leading to the location of many more. While some Palestinians bombers have gotten through and "sleepers" have been scattered to keep up some attacks, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat's ability to sustain these attacks in future months has been crippled. This is shaping up to be Israel's greatest military victory since 1967, and a recovery from the loss of confidence during the Lebanon War.

For the vast majority of Israelis (80 per cent, according to the polls, meaning all but the radical left fringe and the hostile Arab minority), the Oslo experiment is now seen as a disaster. Many of the politicians and intellectuals who supported the fiasco that brought Arafat and his terror network into Israeli cities have either recanted or been removed to the edge of political life.

Labor Party members are trying to get the public to forget its role in Oslo, and the policies of the party's new leader, Defence Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, are hard to distinguish from those of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

And although some old-guard Bolshevik professors in the universities are trying to play up the marginal movement of anti-war reserve officers, most academics keep their distance. In contrast, Benny Morris, a leader of the "new history" movement, has recanted, admitting, "The PA has emerged as a virtual kingdom of mendacity, where every official, from President Arafat down, spends his days lying to a succession of western journalists."

The old Israeli intellectual left's major influence was in Europe, where Palestinian propaganda is gospel. Today, Israelis respond to the ritual condemnations and threats of boycotts from ignorant and arrogant Europeans in terms of a natural disaster – tragic but unavoidable.

However, Israelis still expect a higher standard of morality and intellectual integrity from the United States, and Washington usually delivers. Despite Israelis' and Americans' shared goal of removing Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and his regime of terror, Israelis are not going to continue to play the role of sacrificial lamb. Arafat is using anti-Israeli demonstrations in Arab capitals to buy his old friend Saddam some insurance, and U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and the State Department are still allowing "the Arab street" to make policy.

Nevertheless, Sharon has held his ground instead of meekly accepting American demands to "withdraw immediately." As a result, Powell and his entourage (some of whom have been dispensing bad advice for a decade) have found that expecting Israel to end Operation Defensive Shield prematurely was a non-starter. Convinced by the strength of the Israeli position and policy, Washington has accepted the Israeli position, surprising much of the world (including many Canadian officials).

Despite the difficulties of the current situation, Israelis are confident that, over time, our policies will be vindicated, and this conviction is far more powerful than all of the mass demonstrations, boycotts, and ritual denunciations at the United Nations. The rising support and pro-Israeli rallies, not only in Washington, D.C., but also in Canada, Paris and even Rome, also show that, eventually, the truth will emerge and Israel will be vindicated.

The Kirshner File

Bush has been tactically inconsistent on Mideast

Israel's re-occupation of parts of Area A, the autonomous Palestinian areas in the West Bank, brought out glaring inconsistencies in U.S. President George W. Bush's Middle East policy.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In reacting to Operation Defensive Shield, launched by Israel on March 29 to counter an unprecedented wave of Palestinian suicide bombings and shootings that claimed the lives of scores of Israelis, Bush has zigzagged furiously.

On March 31, three days after the Passover massacre in Netanya in which 28 Israelis were killed, Bush expressed understanding of Israel's military offensive, its biggest since the 1982 invasion of Lebanon. Bush's sympathetic words, uttered just hours after Hamas bombers blew up a restaurant in Haifa, causing 14 deaths, led Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to assume that Bush had given him a green light to root out terrorism in West Bank cities like Jenin, Ramallah and Nablus.

Yet, on April 4, Bush drastically shifted course, thereby straining relations with Israel. Speaking as a "committed friend of Israel," conceding Israel's "right to defend itself from terror" and blasting Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat for not consistently opposing and confronting terrorism, Bush urged Israel to halt its sweep and withdraw. When Sharon balked, saying he required more time to finish Operation Defensive Shield, which cost Israel 29 soldiers, Bush retorted that he expected him "to heed (his) call" and pull back Israel's forces "without delay."

In an attempt to mollify Bush, Sharon ordered a withdrawal from Qalqilya and Tulkarm and, subsequently, from 24 villages. But on April 11, after Israel swept into two new Palestinian towns – Bir Zeit and Dahariya – and Sharon declared that the operation would not end until Israel achieved its aims, the United States joined the United Nations, the European Union and Russia in calling for a ceasefire and Israel's "immediate" withdrawal.

Bush's dramatic volte face prompted a former presidential national security advisor, Zbigniew Brzezinski, to accuse the Bush administration of "strategic incoherence," a charge heatedly denied by the White House.

All rhetoric aside, no amount of official denials could disguise the fact that Bush, tactically at least, had conveyed a decidedly mixed message. In broader strategic terms, however, he and his senior officials, from Secretary of State Colin Powell on down, have been reasonably consistent.

Like his predecessors, Bush supports the land-for-peace formula – the basis of all Mideast diplomacy since the 1967 Six Day War. He believes that Israel's occupation of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and the Golan Heights, as well as its settlements there, are inherently inconsistent with a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

To this, Bush and Powell added another element to the equation: the necessity for a two-state solution in which a secure Israel coexists with a viable Palestinian state. It is a vision that Ehud Barak, more or less, articulated at the Camp David summit in July 2000 and later at Taba. This explains why the United States sponsored and voted for a United Nation Security Council resolution on March 12 endorsing an independent Palestinian state.

And in keeping with Bush's war against international terrorism since the indelible events of Sept. 11, 2001, the United States has pushed and prodded the PA to make a 100 per cent effort to curb terrorism and end violence as a means by which to attain political objectives.

But when it comes to Israeli forays into Area A, fully under the administration of the Palestinians, Bush has not been consistent.

Sharon ordered the first such raid, into the northern Gaza Strip, last April after Hamas fired mortars into Sderot, a development town in the Negev Desert near Sharon's ranch. When Powell heard that Israel might not pull out its troops for days, weeks or months, he denounced the incursion as "excessive and disproportionate," and asked Israel to desist from such assaults in the future.

Sharon defiantly ignored his admonition. In the aftermath of Al Qaeda's attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Israel intensified its retaliatory raids into Area A. Bush complained, leaning on Israel to reach a quick truce with the PA. Bush was eager to build a coalition against Al Qaeda and to unseat the Taliban regime in Afghanistan. Since he also sought to recruit Arab countries into the budding coalition, he needed a measure of calm in the Mideast.

With the Taliban ousted and Al Qaeda routed, Washington relaxed its pressure on Israel, all the more so after a renewed upsurge of Palestinian attacks against Israeli civilians in December, January and February, the breakdown of yet another ceasefire, and Israel's interception of a Palestinian ship carrying tons of Iranian weapons and munitions.

The mood in Washington seemed clear. If the United States, invoking the Bush Doctrine, could fight terrorism in Afghanistan, why did Israel not have a right to hunt down terrorists in the adjacent West Bank and Gaza?

The Pentagon and Congress, but not necessarily the State Department, adopted this view. No one, therefore, was surprised when Powell pointedly questioned Sharon's policy of increased military pressure against the PA. Powell believes that Palestinian terrorism can best be dealt with through a sustained political process.

George W. Bush

In accordance with this philosophy, the United States backed three separate United Nations resolutions on March 12, March 31 and April 4 calling for a ceasefire and an immediate Israeli withdrawal, and Bush, on March 14, described Israel's incursion into Ramallah as "not helpful."

Bush was concerned that Israeli raids – a source of seething anger and bitterness in the Arab world – might generate regional chaos, endanger pro-U.S. Arab regimes in Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, raise the price of Arab crude oil and undermine Arab backing, lukewarm at best, for his emerging plan to topple Saddam Hussein of Iraq.

At the same time, Bush added the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah faction basically controlled by Arafat, to a U.S. list of foreign terrorist organizations. Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine were already on that list.

Powell wound up his third trip to the region last week with little to show for his mediation efforts. A ceasefire, the key to ending the present crisis, eluded him. But Powell managed to wring two important concessions from Israel: a timeline for an Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian towns and an acknowledgement from Sharon that he may yet sit down at the same negotiating table with Arafat, who is still penned up at his besieged compound in Ramallah.

Prior to Powell's departure on April 17, Sharon announced that Israel would vacate Jenin and Nablus, but not Ramallah and Bethlehem, where Palestinian gunmen and some of the suspected assassins of Israeli cabinet minister Rechavam Ze'evi, murdered last October, are said to be holed up.

On April 18, in yet another contradictory remark, Bush said he understood why Israel is keeping troops in Bethlehem and Ramallah. Nevertheless, as Powell wrapped up his mission, Israel and the United States were still far apart on several fundamental issues: Israel's incursions into Area A, Israel's settlement policy in the territories, Arafat's future role, and the point at which political negotiations should commence.

Israel, in responding to Palestinian terrorism, will continue to hit Area A. These raids, which have already resulted in the widespread destruction of the PA's political and police apparatus, will surely complicate Israel's relationship with the United States, its chief ally and patron.

At his final press conference in Jerusalem, Powell described Israel's settlement policy as destructive. But Sharon and many of his ministers staunchly reject that position.

Despite Sharon's apparent willingness to let Arafat negotiate on behalf of the Palestinians, Sharon still regards him as his nemesis, as "irrelevant" and as an "enemy" to be isolated and marginalized. Before he acceded to Powell's request to include Arafat in any talks, Sharon had relegated the Palestinian leader to the status of persona non grata, and had tried to persuade Powell not to meet with Arafat in Ramallah, claiming that such an encounter would be a "tragic mistake." Bush and Powell harbour deep reservations about Arafat's sincerity, but like Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, they regard him as an indispensable negotiating partner.

Finally, Sharon – though not Peres – wants a ceasefire to take root before the parties address the Mitchell recommendations, which were unveiled last April. The United States and Israel were in accord on this issue until quite recently. But of late, Washington has had a change of heart, and now Powell speaks of aggressively moving into political discussions to satisfy Palestinian demands.

Mideast Crisis: The Homefront

Frustration with anti-Israel coverage

"I think the people in your studio... are living on a different planet."

So stated David Horovitz, a moderate who supported the Oslo process of Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation, and editor of the liberal bi-weekly Jerusalem Report magazine. Horovitz was speaking on a special three-hour CBC Radio "This Morning" program considering perspectives on U.S. foreign policy.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Horovitz had been listening to a one-sided panel consisting of John MacArthur, publisher of Harper's magazine; Christopher Hitchens, columnist with The Nation; and Martha Brill Olcott of the Carnegie Endowment. All were critical of U.S.-Mideast policy and U.S.-Israel relations, seeing them as entirely in favour of Israel. (Interviewed from Jerusalem, Horovitz was the only speaker in the entire program to present Israel's case. He was immediately balanced by Jonathan Kuttab, a Palestinian human rights lawyer.)

"I hate to puncture the complacent air of Israel gang-bashing that characterized the first 20 minutes of your show," Horovitz said. "Israelis don't think that American policy under the Bush administration is hopelessly biased towards Israel [which] has endured a year-and-a-half of terrorism.

"Extraordinarily... instead of pressure on [Palestinian Authority Chairman] Yasser Arafat, who has the largest proportion of armed men per capita of any regime in the world... to use his forces to stop the suicide bombings, instead of increased pressure when it became clear that Mr. Arafat, far from failing to thwart them, was actually inciting them, encouraging them, funding them – every time that Israel, in desperation, attempts to move into Palestinian cities to try to stop the bombings it gets told to get out and never go back. For Israelis, this is all absolutely incomprehensible, especially [after the] American assault on Afghanistan."

Horovitz's incredulity concerned the major double standard in judging Israel. One side is espoused by Hitchens who, while lucid about the terrorism confronting the United States, remains clouded about Israel. His general belief is that former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak did not make generous offers at Camp David that Arafat could accept, and that Israel's military operation in the West Bank is designed to continue its "colonial" rule. The implication is that the Palestinians have no option but to resort to violence as "justified resistance."

This, of course, is the favourite tactic of Israel's detractors. If one denigrates Barak's efforts, then one can rationalize, if not justify, the carnage that has been inflicted on Israelis over these many months.

Hirsh Goodman writes in the April 22 issue of the Jerusalem Report: "There is much argument about Ehud Barak's legacy. But there is no denying what he offered the Palestinians: 94 per cent of the West Bank, a division of Jerusalem, a land swap, an equitable solution to the refugee problem and imaginative thinking over the Temple Mount – as a basis for negotiations. Arafat refused."

Unfortunately, such denial is widespread among critics pursuing their relentless anti-Israel outlook.

Jewish group to ignore plan to control rallies

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Members of the United Israel Action Committee (UIAC) intend to ignore statements made by both CJC and Palestine House that all demonstrations in front of cultural centres, places of worship or schools will be halted.

Meir Halevi, a spokesperson for UIAC, a grassroots group that advocates for Israel, said flatly in a telephone interview that his group will decide where its next demonstration will be held.

"Public statements do not mean anything to me."

Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said however, that CJC's statement was an appeal for reason and proper conduct.

"I can only appeal to reason. Would we want to face a Palestinian demonstration every time we took our children to school or extra-curricular activities? We should not do that to them either."

Morgan insisted that parents should not have to be afraid to send their children to Hebrew school or to classes in Jewish community centres, and that he is optimistic that both communities will act in good faith.

The community will rely on the police to issue warnings, if necessary, "but we hope it doesn't come to that," he said.

CJC called upon factions within the Jewish and Palestinian communities to halt protests after a Jewish group protested in front of Palestine House on March 24 and April 14. The Palestinian community responded by saying they will begin targeting Jewish centres.

Rashad Saleh, president of Palestine House, said in a telephone interview from Ottawa that he will not support any demonstrations held in front of cultural centres or places of worship.

"We are opposed to the demonstrations except in front of consulates and embassies, and they will not be allowed. [I am speaking] for everyone in the Palestinian and Arab communities."

All of us, as Canadians, value the right of free association, Morgan said. "We also value the multicultural harmony of Canadian society. For that reason, it is important to express our political views in the right time and place, and to avoid targeting community centres that run programs for children and families.

"With passions as high as they are, the safety of all is of paramount concern at CJC. As we pray for peace in the Middle East, we must also reconfirm that inter-ethnic intimidation and violence has no place in Canada."

Grassroots rallies set for consulates this week

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A couple of weeks ago, just after she'd heard about yet another suicide bombing in Jerusalem, Annette Hoffman felt at her wits end.

Overwhelmed by the terrible toll the bombings had taken on the people of Israel and uneasy about simply carrying on with her life as though nothing had changed, she decided to take action.

A real estate agent by profession, Hoffman got on the phone and began calling friends and colleagues. With the help of her childhood chum, Inna Zaslavsky, Hoffman organized a solidarity rally that is scheduled to take place at the Israeli Consulate, 180 Bloor West, on Friday April 25 at 11 a.m.

"We're just a bunch of average people who can't keep silent any more," Hoffman said.

Rachel Turkienicz tells a similar story. She felt "frustration at the alarming increased rate of overt anti-Semitic attacks in Europe."

Events in France were particularly disconcerting and despite the belated condemnation of attacks on Jews voiced by French political leadership, she felt public statements critical of Israel were fanning the flames of hatred aimed at Jews.

She too decided it was time to act and, starting with phone calls to her Torah study group, Turkienicz organized a series of evening vigils outside the Consulate General of France, 130 Bloor West. Neither a protest nor a rally, the vigils will demonstrate "we stand in support and solidarity with the Jews in France so they don't feel alone and think the world Jewish community is not supporting them."

A second aspect of the vigil is to show "we're supportive and heartened they [the government of France] has taken note of the problem," she said.

The vigils will be held Monday to Thursday from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. beginning on April 24 with an option of adding lunchtime events if response warrants. Although news of the events spread initially by word of mouth, Turkienicz has enlisted the help of Canadian Jewish Congress, which has assisted in logistical matters and is helping to co-ordinate attendance to ensure a presence each evening.

Congress, too, has been concerned by events in France, which has seen more than 300 anti-Semitic incidents occur in the last month alone, including synagogue arson, cemetery vandalism and attacks on individuals.

Ontario Congress officials recently met with France's consul-general in Toronto, Hujues Goisbault, while a second Congress delegation met with the French consul in Moncton.

"We were met with considerable goodwill. [Goisbault] seemed personally insulted that it was happening in his country," said Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy for Congress' Ontario region.

The Middle East was also discussed, and Congress voiced concerns that France's policy was showing "a heavy tilt in favour of the Palestinians and less than a sincere concern and sympathy for what Israel needs to do to confront terror," he said.

Turkienicz said the vigil participants will ask the government of France to consider that "their voting record at the UN has not been helpful for the Jewish community."

The dinner party comments by a French diplomat that Israel was a "shitty little country" could "promote internal discord directed at Jews," she added.

Like Turkienicz, Hoffman felt she could no longer keep silent as world events unfolded.

"We want people to know the Jewish community is not going to be quiet and function like nothing is going on. Something is going on. We're too silent, Toronto has been too quiet," she said.

Hoffman said that while she is a novice at organizing public demonstrations, her ultimate goal is to present a "united Jewish nation" standing in solidarity with Israel. She believes the Jewish community is receptive to her idea.

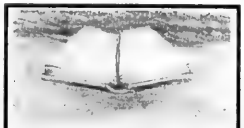
BUILDING A JEWISH TOMORROW

Jewish Life

Lag b'Omer - a taste of joy

By RABBI MORDECAI ZEITZ



In the period between Pesach and Shavuot, called the Omer, we count 49 days (seven weeks). For a period of 33 days, we are considered to be in a status of semi-mourning – we don't go to weddings, we don't listen to music and we don't groom ourselves normally. Then, in the midst of this counting, there comes a day of joy and celebration – Lag b'Omer – the 33rd day of the Omer. Semi-mourning practices are lifted and simchahs abound. On Mt. Meron in Israel, the traditional first haircuts are given to children amidst great celebration. Lag b'Omer is an oasis of celebration in the midst of mourning.

In a way, this is the special ingredient of Jewish continuity. Regardless of the pain and suffering in our lives, and the toll this pain has taken on the well-being of the State of Israel and its citizens, we still persist in living and celebrating life in as normal a fashion as possible. The Lag b'Omer factor is our ability to focus on the positive and not become overwhelmed by the negative. While we might grieve again tomorrow, today we find reason to live and to celebrate that precious gift of life.

But why must we be constantly subjected to such suffering and grief? What prevents the breaking out of Lag b'Omer and thus the eradication of pain? Is there something we are missing that allows us only a taste of joy rather than a full diet of simchah?

While there are many explanations, I believe the history of Lag b'Omer itself contains the answer. Tradition tells us of the plague that killed 24,000 of Rabbi Akiva's students. The reason for this terrible plight was the fact that they did not treat each other with respect. But on the 33rd day, the plague stopped and the rest of the students were spared.

Is it possible that there was a sudden love-in that lifted the plague? It's hard to imagine a 24-hour turnaround in human relations. It doesn't happen so quickly. These matters of human interaction and attitudes take time.

Lag b'Omer made them realize, as it does us, the way life can be and consequently, they began celebrating life rather than destroying it. Just stopping to realize the consequences of unbridled hate and prejudice, of creating barriers rather than bridges, of being exclusive rather than inclusive, should prompt us to seek a cure for the plague that engulfs us. That's the Lag b'Omer potential. That alone is worthy of celebration.

It's easy to put the blame elsewhere. But the cure has to start with us, which means we have to recognize the problem. Consider digging down deep into a mineshaft. Loads of dirt are brought to the surface, worthless except to the person who has the expert eye and recognizes a special quality in a particular chunk. The dirt is hosed off under tremendous pressure and a gem emerges. The artisan polishes it and it seems perfect. It seems fit for a king's crown. Yet the expert eye sees a flaw that others seem to have missed. With all the qualities, there is still something missing.

The Jewish people and the State of Israel have emerged as shining gems, after having been subjected to the tremendous pressures of anihilation throughout the ages. Have they not earned their rightful place? Is there still something missing that prevents a total Lag b'Omer life?

The singular flaw that remains is our lack of Jewish unity, of treating each other with respect. We have the right to disagree, but we must do so with reverance and a tolorance for a divergence of views. Not being able to achieve that unity prevents the brilliance of the gem we have to share with the world to shine through. Whether in North America or in Israel, the challenge of Lag b'Omer starts with us. It is the challenge to start a campaign of unity of spirit and purpose and respect amongst our families, friends and Jewish communities and to then expand this cycle of tolorance and mutual respect to the wider community of humankind.

Rabbi Zeitz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Tikvah in Montreal.

Mordecai's protest instructive in current climate

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

"These are the times that try men's souls," wrote Thomas Paine famously in the wake of the American Revolution. Jews are used to having not only our souls tested, but our bodies battered and our reputations sullied. We have more than endured; we have enriched the world with our often undesired survival.

In crisis, however, much is learned about how we think, what we value, what we fear. Buzzing around the state of siege that characterizes present-day Israel, a lot of instant expertise vultures swoop in with their opinions. But it is the long view that education relishes, and just such a perspective is offered to us in the texts that have informed the Jewish consciousness for thousands of years. One of the most eerily insightful of those sacred writings, Megillat Esther, is well worth consulting at moments like these.

At the opening of Chapter 4, Mordecai sits down at the gates of the king's palace, his clothes ripped, his face black with ashes. Unafraid of public ridicule, contemptuous of "security issues," this Diaspora Jew makes a very public spectacle of himself in the eyes of his none-too-sympathetic gentile neighbours. But Mordecai is neither impulsive nor irrational. He realizes that, in the wake of Haman's genocidal decree, and the numbness of his "perplexed" fellow Jews of Shushan, the time for dinner-party conversation and shul lectures is long past. It is time for blatant and very obvious gesturing and protest in front of the whole world.

Even the queen is slow to pick up on Mordecai's insight, and her first reaction is to send him some clothes, to "cover him up" in front of the CNN cameras and make him seem presentable.

But Mordecai offers this famous rejoinder: "Do not imagine in your heart that you, of all the Jews, will escape... For if you insist on remaining silent at this time, relief and deliverance will come to the Jews from elsewhere, but you and your father's house will perish."

Although these words have a pleasing bravado, they seem illogical. Shouldn't Esther, of all people, be the one in the least amount of danger, being married to the king and well-ensconced within a palace that knows not of her Jewishness?

The Israeli writer Yoram Hazoni points out beautifully just why Mordecai's words are not a bluff. If Esther remains unmoved as her innocent brethren are slaughtered, if she remains silent and even feeling hapless while her people are under attack, then "she will have finally and completely returned to that condition of powerless, spiritless bondage, which as a Jew she should have left behind in Egypt."

Esther's moment of truth is the one that Jews the world over – all of us – face right now: to choose, again in Hazony's words, between "the horror which has reared itself up before her, the numbing paralysis of it; and picking up a stick and swinging with all her might, with anything and everything she has ever had in her, to smash it."

Truth is not an opinion poll. One can be right even if all others disagree. In his essay, Civil Disobedience, Henry David Thoreau encourages that one's life be "a counter-friction to stop the machine. [Do not wait until you] constitute a majority of one... Even suppose blood should flow. Is there not a blood shed when the conscience is wounded? I see this blood flowing now."

Yiddish radio project

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Thanks to a lucky coincidence followed by almost two decades of hard work, we now have the opportunity to eavesdrop on a lost world: America's Yiddish speaking community of the 1930s, '40s and '50s.

You can now listen to the Yiddish Radio Project on the World Wide Web – and it's an opportunity you shouldn't miss [http://yiddishradioproject.org/]. The Web site points out that Yiddish radio flourished from the 1930s:

"In New York alone, 23 stations broadcast dramas, variety programs, man-on-the-street interviews, music, commercials, even editorials in rhyme... There were the searing dramas of Nahum Stutchkoff, which grappled with the difficult reality of Jewish immigrant experience; the mediation program of Rabbi Samuel A. Rubin, who resolved disputes among Jews too poor or disempowered to turn to the civil courts; the advice show of C. Israel Lutsky, whom many listeners trusted more than their rabbi; and the talent shows that turned the microphone to anyone in the neighbourhood ..."

This incredible radio series is the product of years of painstaking work by Henry Sapoznik. In 1985, Sapoznik was the sound archivist at the Yiddish research institute YIVO. He attended a rummage sale and walked away with some old-fashioned discs with Yiddish labels that said, "WEVD... WBNX... Yiddish Melodies in Swing... Stuhmer's Pumpernickel Program... Life is Funny with Harry Hirschfield, sponsored by Edelstein's Tuxedo Brand Cheese." He put the first disc on the turntable and heard: "From atop the Loews State Theater Building, the B. Manischewitz Company, world's largest matzah bakers, happily presents Yiddish Melodies in Swing..."

Sapoznik realized the importance of his find. "It was simply unbelievable, unlike anything I'd ever heard. I felt like I was being transported back in time to the real, living moment of history. I was transfixed."

Sapoznik spent the next 17 years hunting down more discs, restoring their clarity and creating a marvelously entertaining radio documentary series. The series, which is divided into 10 segments, each running from 15 to 20 minutes, will be airing weekly until May 21 on National Public Radio in the United States. And you can listen in for free any time you'd like thanks to the Internet [http://cityguide.lansingstatejournal.com/fe/things/020320_yiddishradio_6d.asp].

In the episode Yiddish Melodies in Swing, we hear how the song Bey Mir Bist Du Schein caused a sensation both inside and outside Yiddish circles. And in the segment on Yiddish radio commercials, we hear how crooner Seymour Rexite was a singing sensation for four decades.

Have you heard Surrey with a Fringe on Top sung in Yiddish? Now you can. There's also the bittersweet story of "Charles A. Levine and His Flying Machine." Levine became a hero to America's Jewish community when he became the first man to cross the Atlantic in an airplane – as a passenger! Unfortunately, fame didn't bring happiness for Levine. And then there was the matter of the FBI. But you'll have to listen in to find out more.

What is particularly wonderful about the Web site is that it has so many extras. There's an essay about Brooklyn Yiddish radio by Sapoznik, and you can hear audio snippets of the biggest singers who have recorded Bey Mir Bist Du Schein, as well as The Star Spangled Banner in Yiddish... and a jazzy version of Dayeinu.

A lovely twist is that Henry's mother, Pearl, is featured in some of the episodes, reminiscing about what it was like to tune in to Yiddish radio during its heyday. You can also hear her explain the meanings of some common Yiddish words such as kibbitz, kvesch, luftmensch, shvitzer and even mamzer [http://www.npr.org/programs/atc/features/2002/yiddish/words.html].

Pearl Sapoznik never explains the word kvell. But you can certainly hear the pride in her voice whenever she mentions her son's name and his work in creating the Yiddish Radio Project. Don't miss this delightful "Web seite."

Principles of Spiritual Activism*, by Avi Weiss: KTAV Publishing House Inc., 2002, $18.95 (US).

If activism on behalf of the Jewish people is alive and well, then much of the credit must go to Rabbi Avi Weiss, senior rabbi of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, N.Y., and national president of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns – Amcha.

Rabbi Weiss has organized and taken part in hundreds of demonstrations, hunger strikes and acts of non-violent civil disobedience. In addition to his unremitting efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews and his defence of the State of Israel, he has confronted and denounced such anti-Semites as David Duke and Louis Farrakhan.

He led the protest against the presence of a Catholic convent at the Auschwitz death camp and excoriated Mayor David Dinkins of New York City for police inaction when Jews were being attacked during the 1991 Crown Heights riots.

Why is activism necessary? How is it best achieved or undertaken? These are some of the basic questions the author deals with in this thoughtful and lively compilation of about 40 brief articles and essays written in recent years for a wide variety of Jewish newspapers and journals across the United States.

In discussing his protest in Poland at Auschwitz-Birkenau, Rabbi Weiss writes that it is possible that 50 years from now, all that will be left at these and other camps will be Christian symbols and houses of worship. People may then come to assume that the Holocaust was directed at Catholics, or that the Vatican courageously fought to protect Jews from their Nazi tormentors.

Yet "the truth is that not only did the Vatican largely fail to help Jews, but it actually assisted Nazis to flee to places of refuge after the war."

Rabbi Weiss maintains that the more frequently and loudly one speaks out for a beleaguered community, the more that community is protected. In 1987, when he led a group to Rome to protest the Vatican's embrace of Austrian president Kurt Waldheim, the Jewish community was "paralysed with fear." By the end of his visit, however, he had persuaded 500 Jews to accompany him in a protest march to Vatican Square. "I spoke to the group about Titus, who, after the destruction of the Second Temple, marched the Jews down the Tiber River as slaves to build the Coliseum. Today we marched as free Jews. We were not grovelling; we stood strong."

In the constant battle on behalf of Jewish rights, the author insists that rabbis and religious leaders must adopt a moratorium on antagonism directed at other Jewish groups. To do otherwise would be foolish and self-defeating in the face of unremitting hostility and never-ending problems.

Of the many articles Rabbi Weiss submitted to newspapers, only a few were refused publication. One that was suggested that the size of a financial donation ought not to be the sole criterion for Jewish community leadership. He wrote, "It is distressing when every board member of an organization is a high-income earner and is expected to contribute large amounts. Such boards by definition do not represent the people and do not provide a place for other talents that could be of good use. Only a balance of individuals can adequately represent the community and properly assess its needs."

Despite having had several heart attacks, the author remains an unreconstructed activist. The events of Sept. 11 underline his conviction that, in our time, every concerned and thinking Jew must become a spiritual activist. There is no other valid alternative.

Canadians join sea of support in Washington

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Close to 1,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community joined a crowd of more than 100,000 in Washington, D.C., last week in a ground swell of support for Israel.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chartered a plane and several buses to bring hundreds of people together with other Canadians who drove through the night to march to the U.S. Capitol building to hear politicians, writers and religious leaders speak to the We Stand With Israel Now and Forever rally.

Observant and secular Jews of all ages came to hear leaders speak out in unambiguous opposition to terrorism at what several speakers called the largest gathering in support of Israel ever held in the United States.

The event, which included participants from across the United States and Canada, was organized in less than a week by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and United Jewish Communities.

Toronto lawyer Barry Naiberg, who joined the sea of people with his daughter Robyn and her husband Jason Goldberg, said everybody just wanted to show their support of Israel and America. "They weren't there to make political statements," Naiberg said.

Given the anti-Semitic acts occurring all over the world, it is important to come together to show support for Israel and America – Israel's greatest friend right now, he said.

Sharpshooters were positioned atop the Capitol building and helicopters flew intermittently over the crowd during a hot day that caught many unprepared. More than 100 people were treated for heat exhaustion.

But the crowd was vocal and excited during the event, which began with the singing of Hatikvah and the proclamation by Janet Parshall, representing the National Religious Broadcasters, that Christians and Jews will never vacillate in their support for Israel.

Natan Sharansky, Israel's minister of housing recalled the rally in December 1987 in Washington when Jews demonstrated in solidarity with Soviet Jewry.

"Jewish people are once again struggling with evil and it threatens all the free people around the world," Sharansky said, adding that "if we let the world know that the Jews of the Diaspora and the Jews of Israel are united, we will succeed."

Writer and Nobel Peace Prize laureate Eli Wiesel said that "terrorism knows no borders and therefore the opposition to terrorism must know no borders."

"We are here to let Israel and her soldiers know that they are not alone," Wiesel said.

The crowd booed U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defence Paul Wolfowitz's comments about the suffering of the innocent Palestinians and an eventual Palestinian state, but cheered former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani's affirmation that "we are all here… to support America, Israel and all those who oppose terrorism."

To chants of "Rudy, Rudy," Giuliani described Israel as "an oasis of democracy in the middle of authoritarian governments."

He reminded the crowd that after Sept. 11, "Israel stood with us shoulder to shoulder while others refused to condemn the violence.

"We remember that… and we are not going to cower or back down."

Giuliani said churches and mosques have never been treated as fairly as they are under Israeli rule and that Israel must be commended for its belief in the rule of law and its respect for human rights.

"Peace must be based on reality," Giuliani said. "Let us be clear. There is no moral equivalency between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

But "there is a difference between a country that believes in democracy and one that harbours terrorism."

Former Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, who was recently appointed spokesperson for the Israeli government, thanked the American people for standing up for good over evil.

"No greater friend has ever been in the White House," Netanyahu said.

"Like America, Israel did not seek this war. It was forced upon us by barbarians, by an enemy that sends children to die and kill other children."

"Arafat is not a partner for peace," Netanyahu said.

The root cause of terrorism is not the deprivation of national civil rights, Netanyahu told the rally.

If that were the case, leaders such as Mahatma Ghandi and Martin Luther King would have resorted to terrorism in pursuit of their rights.

But they were democrats, not terrorists, Netanyahu said, adding that "the root cause of terrorism is totalitarianism.

"From Lenin to Stalin to Osama to Arafat – those that fight as terrorists rule as terrorists – whether in Afghanistan, Iranistan, Iraquistan or Arafatistan."

But people are no longer fooled by Arafat, Netanyahu said. "They know that Arafat is simply Osama with good public relations."

Netanyahu said the Washington rally sends a message to the anti-Semites of the world: "We are not afraid."

Mideast Crisis: The Homefront

NDP's demotion of Robinson fails to impress

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Not even a personal telephone call from New Democratic Party leader Alexa McDonough has convinced Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), that the NDP has changed its "biased and simplistic" stance on the Middle East.

McDonough called Landy last Thursday to explain her decision to demote MP Svend Robinson for his controversial statements on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Robinson will remain as foreign affairs critic, but McDonough will assume responsibilities for the Middle East.

"She expressed a certain sense of regret not dissimilar to her [public] statements," Landy told The CJN, "but she did not back off [from her belief] that her party's Mideast position is balanced."

Landy said he's pleased McDonough "reached out" to the Jewish community, but "I don't believe it has changed our view of her party's position on the Middle East."

In a statement, CJC called McDonough's move a "half-measure" that doesn't go far enough to restore the NDP's credibility.

That credibility was shattered, say Jewish officials, with Robinson's widely-covered attempt earlier this month to visit Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat at his besieged Ramallah headquarters in a show of support. Television pictures showed a flak-jacketed Robinson arguing with an Israeli soldier at one checkpoint, and then getting pushed forcefully by a second soldier at another crossing.

On his return, Robinson said Israel was guilty of "torture and murder."

Robinson's "anti-Israel bias was a longstanding matter of public record, well before his recent cheap stunt in Ramallah," CJC stated. "His distinct lack of impartiality disqualifies him from such a sensitive position in the NDP shadow cabinet and he should have been stripped altogether of his role as foreign affairs critic. How can the NDP expect the Canadian public to take seriously a spokesperson on international policy who cannot comment on one of the most pressing issue in today's foreign relations?"

The issue came to a head last week following a scathing column in the National Post by former Ontario NDP premier Bob Rae, headlined Parting Company With the NDP. Rae criticized Robinson for taking sides in the Mideast dispute, saying that if the MP's trip to the West Bank had been "a solitary event, it might have been possible to brush it off as yet another escapade from a histrionic crank... Mr. Robinson's views are apparently now the official stand of the federal New Democratic Party. They are not mine."

The next day, McDonough issued a rebuttal, saying the NDP remains "committed to the right of Israel to exist within secure borders and the right of Palestinians to their homeland.

"Let me again state clearly the New Democratic Party will not be part of a critique of Israel that includes the promotion of the hatred of Jews.

"For us, there is no justification for suicide bombers targeting innocent civilians," she said. "Nor do we support the horrifying and counterproductive Israeli military action in the occupied territories."

The day after, McDonough announced she was demoting Robinson "because of a regrettable public perception that the NDP has abandoned its longstanding balanced position, which supports the right of Israel to exist within secure borders and the right of Palestinians to a homeland." However, she called Robinson a "conscientious" critic.

She also distanced herself from remarks she made recently that equated Israeli military action with terrorism, saying, "I think it is not helpful in this situation to talk in those terms."

Robinson, who is reportedly is planning a trip to Baghdad, said he won't be silenced.

While condemning suicide bombings, he told reporters he "will continue to condemn the appalling brutality and violence of the Israeli government in its military operations."

He blamed the media for misrepresenting his motives as anti-Semitic. "It is painful to me personally to hear these allegations. I have fought anti-Semitism and all forms of discrimination all my life and will continue to do so."

Later that day, he took part in an anti-Israel protest on Parliament Hill.

Robinson is "clearly out of sync with his leader and his party," said Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee. "I can't imagine that a Canadian legislator can find values in common with a corrupt dictatorship."

UJA Federation announces nominees

TORONTO – Alan Sandler, Nominations Committee Chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the Board of Directors and Individual Representatives to Council.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Tuesday, June 4, 2002 in the Conference Centre of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street at 8:00 a.m.

In accordance with the new by-laws, the governance consists of a Council, a Board of Directors and an Executive Committee. The Executive Committee will be elected by the Board of Directors from among the Directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following by-laws:

"Only members of the Federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an individual or Group Representative on the Council.

"Any 20 Representatives may nominate any individual member of the Federation for election to the Board of Directors and the positions of Chair and Vice-Chair, provided that: (a) any one Individual Representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Directors; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

"Any seven members may nominate any individual member of the Federation for election to the Council provided that: (a) any one member may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Council; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the Federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council."

Nominated for Chair of the Board is Ralph Shedletsky and Vice-Chair of the Board is Leslie Gales. Nominees for the Board of Directors include: Ronald Appleby, Brent Belzberg, Lesley Binstock Offman, Lawrence Bloomberg, Michael Bregman, Karen Chisvin, Peter Cohen, Peter Ekstein, David Engel, Judith Finer-Freedman, Ron Frisch, Marty Goldberg, Leo Goldhar, David Goldstein, Toddy Granovsky, Louis Greenbaum, Marshall Kesten, Warren Kimel, Igor Korenzvit, David Koschitzky, Julia Koschitzky, Howard Lichtman, Glennie Lindenberg, Baila Lubek, Jack Mintz, Barry Naiberg, Neil Nisker, Elliott Peranson, Morris Perlis, Allan Reitzes, Naomi Rose, Alan Sandler, Jacques Sayegh, Hinda Silber, Howard Sokolowski, Carole Sterling, Lawrence Tanenbaum, Cyrel Troster and Henry Wolfond.

The following Individual Representatives are to be elected for a two-year term 2002-2004 to the Federation Council: Sandra Atlin, Marlene Axmith, Arna Banack, Donna Bank, Tobie Bekhor, Arthur Benjamin, Marc Benjamin, Austin Beutel, David Wm. Brown, Robert Cherniak, Karen Chisvin, Jeffrey Cohen, Roz Davidson, Yale Drazin, Susan Fenwick, Bernard Fishbein, Abe Glowinsky, Alison Himel, Brian Goldberg, Jeffrey Goldfarb, Stephen Goldhar, Sheldon Goodman, Harry Gorman, Dr. Shawna Granovsky, Abraham J. Green, Judy Gwartz, Michael Halbert, Barbara Hennick, Genya Intrator, Cheryl Jackson, Lynn Kirshin, Leslie Klein, Henry Koschitzky, Ruth Ladovsky, Judy Libman, Thomas Lobel, Agi Mandel, Howard Meyer, Paul Morton, Neil Nisker, Gilbert Palter, David Peltz, Dr. Jill Reitman, Gerald Richler, Gerald Ross, Sheila Rother, Laurie Sheff, Jacques Singer, Michael Serruya, Marlene Sklar, Fran Sonshine, Pamela Medjuck Stein, Carole Sterling, Arthur Stern, Raymond Stone, Ken Tanenbaum, Mark Waldman, George Wasserstein, Dodi Weill and Cecille Zaifman.

In addition to the Individual Representatives listed, each Group Member of the Federation shall be entitled to two representatives on the Council (Group Representatives). Any Group Member which has membership in good standing in excess of 100 persons residing in the Greater Toronto Area shall be entitled to one additional Group Representative on the Council. "Group" means any charitable, educational, social, cultural, religious or recreational agency, organization or congregation, unincorporated or incorporated (without share capital) whose activities are carried out primarily in the Greater Toronto Area (including the main Greater Toronto Area branch or division of national organizations), having a Jewish membership of at least 25 persons, or such other agency or organization which may be accepted by the Directors.

Mideast Crisis: The Homefront

Jews came out to pray and express their support for Israel at the rally in Ottawa last Sunday. [Vera Gillman photo]

Standing beside Israel from a distance

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Despite the early hour, everyone on the bus was in high spirits. Beneath the calls to friends and snatches of laughter, there was a sense of anticipation.

Led Zeppelin's The Immigrant Song carried toward me from a few rows up. Some people read, some slept; others played cards. One girl munched on a muffin from her kosher catered lunch. For the next four hours, the energy of 55 people travelling from Toronto to Ottawa to attend last Sunday's rally for Israel on Parliament Hill was held in check.

Along the way, people expressed their reasons for participating in the event with sometimes grave, yet always hopeful and determined, remarks.

Joyce Sasson, a mother of three students who were also attending the rally, said we have to "join together, unite from the whole spectrum." She hoped, she said, to "finally present a voice to the Canadian government and to Canadian society at large that we are who we are and that we support Israel as Jews and as Canadians."

Avi Collins felt it was important to take his son Yoni, 7, to the event. "I believe it's my duty as an Israeli citizen and as a Jew – and as a Canadian – to show... Israelis that we stand beside them even from a distance."

Ruth and Albert Edelstein recalled the community gatherings in Toronto after World War II, before the Jewish state was established.

"We can remember as teenagers the rallies going to Maple Leaf Gardens or to Massey Hall, where the marches took place in support of trying to establish the state of Israel," Albert said, adding that today, he felt it was necessary to show his support for Israel, "rather than just sitting at home and hoping somebody else will do it...

"We have children and grandchildren on these buses," he said. "It's one way of showing these kids that it can cover all generations."

A.J. Goldberg, a student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), came to the rally, he said, "to show that Jews will always unite under pressure, to show that they're never going to give up... and still have a good time."

Sandy Benayon, a teacher at the same school, said she and the students attended because it was an important historical event.

"Our students learn a lot about Jewish history, but right now they're living it," she said.

As I stood among the tightly packed crowd – warm despite the cold air – listening to the throaty cheers of 20,000 people, watching a solitary, multi-coloured kite with an Israeli flag snake through the pale blue sky, I pondered that last remark.

Comment

Keynote speaker Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's deputy foreign minister, asked: "What is civilization? Civilization is the recognition that certain values – human life, truth, tolerance, love of parents for children – are sacrosanct, and that no goal or political objective can justify violating them."

In front of me, a young boy stood with his arms wrapped tightly around his mother. A lump rose in my throat.

It was an emotional Hatikvah. Afterward, Judith Hooper, who returned from Israel just a week before the rally, said to me, "[The situation there is] just the way we think it is, and a little worse.

"I think we came together as Jews to give ourselves a little courage. If it's no good in Israel, it won't be so freilach [happy] here. We're strong and we have to stay strong."

Miriam Anidjar added, "I think we've shown the world, not only Israel, that all the Jews across Canada think about [Israelis], care about them and are on their side."

United. Strong. Pained, yet determined to continue. Clichés, all. But during these historic times, the words carry new resonance. The majestic Peace Tower clock chimed its half-hour. This time, as many times in the past, these words have been taken to heart.

Thousands rally in nation's capital

Israel Ambassador Haim Divon thanked the crowd for its strong support. "When Israel was calling, this is the answer. You are here answering our call. You are here with us and behind us in our fight against terrorism," he said.

While acknowledging the many groups of Christian friends who joined the peaceful demonstration in solidarity with Israel, Levitz informed the crowd that numerous members of Parliament had been invited to attend, but had declined.

The lone MP in attendance was Joe Volpe, the representative from Toronto's Eglinton-Lawrence riding. While comparing the values of Parliament to those of the Jewish people, Volpe tried to assure the crowd that every member of Parliament would agree with him.

"There is not a member of Parliament in this place, your home, that would disagree for one moment that the people of Israel, the Jews of Canada and elsewhere, symbolize those values which we promote every day in the halls behind us," he said. "This is a time that Canada stands beside its friends. This is the time that Canada stands for Israel."

In response to Levitz' announcement that other MPs had been invited to attend, Volpe said, "[Mount Royal MP] Irwin Cotler speaks for all of us."

In his address, Cotler referred to Israel as "the drama and development of civilization itself, the first nation of humankind.

"Israel is not a CNN clip," he said.

"The Jewish people are the only people amongst the world who still inhabit the same land, pray to the same God, speak the same aboriginal language – Hebrew – and bear the same name, Israel, as we did 3,500 years ago," Cotler said.

With strong words, he noted that while most people think that we wouldn't have the State of Israel without the Holocaust, it's the other way around: if there had been a State of Israel, there wouldn't have been a Holocaust.

"There are many good people in this country, non-Jews as well as Jews, who believe that this is not just a Jewish cause but a just cause, for Israel asks for nothing else but the right to live in peace with its neighbours," he said.

Rev. James Christie, senior minister of Southminster United Church in Ottawa, came to pray for the peace of Jerusalem.

"I have come to weep for Israeli and Palestinian alike, all grandchildren of Adam and Eve," he said.

Rev. Christie came to the rally because his Jewish friends had asked him to, he said. "And so as a friend to my friends, I declare again… that the right of Israel to exist in peace and security is inviolable."

Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke out against terrorism.

"Terrorism is not situational, terrorism is not divisible, terrorism is not a buffet where you pick and choose your targets," he said to strong applause. "You cannot say no to al-Qaeda and yes to Hamas, Hezbollah and the Al-Aqsa Brigades. You cannot say yes to cave-to-cave sweeps and no to house-to-house sweeps. You cannot say no to terrorism everywhere and yes to terrorism somewhere. So here is what I do say… Let no one sacrifice Israel's security on the altar of political expedience."

Landy expressed gratitude to the Canadian government for its efforts in Geneva where Foreign Minister Bill Graham pledged to Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior to fight the systemic anti-Israel bias of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

"My friends," Landy said, "we acknowledge that Israel has many supporters across all political lines in this noble edifice behind us. Our government, a true friend of Israel, has done much; it can do much more. The Canadian Alliance has also shown itself to be a dependable and principled friend of the State of Israel.

"We urge other political parties to speak out on behalf of Israel's right to exist as a Jewish State in the Middle East and to defend itself properly and effectively. And if you have the word 'democratic' in your party's name, do not forsake the only state in the entire Middle East that truly is democratic. In a region of repressive dictatorships and dynastic despotisms, Israel stands as a beacon of democracy with a system of laws and a culture of human rights that increasingly looks to our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms for inspiration."

Rabbi Melchior began his address with words of condolence from the government and people of Israel to the government and people of Canada for the deaths of four soldiers in Afghanistan, "for the terrible loss in the fight for democracy and decency."

He then assured the crowd that "the echoes of [your rallying] and your friendship… are reaching Jerusalem. The echoes are telling us that this war which has been forced upon us is a crucial war, not just for Israel but for civilization itself."

On the eve of his departure for Brussels to attend meetings of the World Jewish Congress, Rabbi Melchior said, "Today we see anti-Semitism spreading once again like a plague, with attacks throughout Europe raising painful spectres of the last century… Anti-Semitism, like terrorism, breeds in those places where there is no courage to confront it, and believe me, I am bringing this message with me to Brussels."

"This fight seems overwhelming," Rabbi Melchior concluded. "But our people, from its earliest days, have found ways of crossing such seas. I pray… we will cross this sea as well."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, arrived at the rally directly from Israel, where he was part of a solidarity mission made up of representatives from seven cities across Canada.

"I am able to tell you from being there for a few days that there is no question that we need Israel and Israel needs us," he said. "What we saw was a people who are resolute and determined in fighting terror but a people who are still infused with love and refuse to capitulate to hate."

The rally, which also included a request to support Israel from Harvey Wolfe, chair of the World Board of Trustees of Keren Hayesod/United Israel Appeal, concluded with the singing of Hatikvah.

Don't miss next week's issue of The CJN for an interview with Rabbi Melchior. More rally photos can be found at www.cjnews.com.

Israeli youth talk about life in a conflict zone

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On a recent visit to Toronto, two Israeli high school students and their teacher said their lives in Israel can be summed up by the words they once read on a banner.

"We cry and cry and cry, and then we pick ourselves up and continue," said Rivka Bejell, who together with her students, Hagit Krakow, 16, and Nir Kallawa, 17, were speaking to students at Vaughan Academy.

The three, who also spoke at CHAT and Havergal College, were here as guests of a group of congregants from Holy Blossom Temple who had visited their school, Lycee Municipal Masorati Alliance Israelite, while visiting Israel last December.

The aim of the Israelis' visit was to allow others to hear what it is like for youth to live in a conflict zone.

"Things happen daily; every day we bury at least four people. We don't talk about it every day, however. We try to get our lives back to normal," said Krakow.

The Passover massacre was not soldier against soldier, said Krakow. "It was soldiers against innocent civilians. In one second, everything changed. It just doesn't end."

Bejell said that the people killed at the seder were people without family. "They were getting together to try and enjoy the holiday. Why did the Palestinians choose these people to show their hate?"

Asked by a student in the Grade 11 20th century world history class if they support the policies of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Bejell replied, "Definitely. How can we let these things happen? We can't live in fear for our lives. We have to stop the terrorists. There is a price, but it has to be done."

The difference between the Palestinians and the Israelis, said Krakow, is that Israelis value human life. "When Israel goes into the territories, it's going in only to take away guns. Israeli soldiers risk their lives trying not to kill the innocent. When we go into refugee camps, we tell people not involved to get out. We go in to take terrorists and weapons."

Hallawa said the army rule is not to shoot unless it is in defence. "The value of life is the most important thing."

Meanwhile, he said, Palestinian children go to "summer camps" and learn to shoot guns and learn about hate. "They are indoctrinated with hate and they grow up with warped ideas of Jews and of Israel. It is very difficult to fight these lies. Things have to change from the top."

Asked if they are frustrated and upset about the world opinion about Israel, Krakow said, "Yes, we feel isolated and alone. We feel the people outside of Israel hate us. The media does not bring out the whole picture."

They handed out a sheet of photos of the 415 Israelis killed by terrorists in the past 18 months. "This is a situation that cannot be tolerated," said Bejell.

"We are working against hate which has not limits and does not value life. We have seen mothers at a Palestinian funeral talk about 'the cause.' It makes us flip," said Bejell.

In response to a question about how the conflict can be resolved, Krakow said the problem lies with the Palestinian leadership. "They don't let people have an opinion. Once the leadership changes, maybe things can change. As long as this leadership is in power, there is no solution."

Bejell said the events of Sept. 11 were an eye-opener to the world. "People discovered that terrorists can strike anywhere; the main issue is hate. The world has to fight terrorism and it has to be careful. It is not only Israel against the Palestinians. It is the free world against terrorism."

A student who had lived in Israel for several years said she did not know how they dealt with the constant stress of daily life in Israel.

"Living in the situation," said Krakow, "is easier than reading about it from far away. It is not a bad life; we are just going through a rough period. We love our life.

"Every day we have to be strong; we don't let fear control our lives. In order to keep sane, we have to live normal lives. We live in a different reality. We have to get used to a terrible situation.

"We are determined we will not run away. I believe Israel is the home of the Jews, and I want my children and my grandchildren to grow up there," she said.

Now. More than ever.

Now more than ever Israel needs us.

Now, when Israel faces some of its darkest days since Independence, 54 years ago.

Israel is facing an emergency. Social services are strained to the limit by relentless terror. The government has transferred more than $2 billion from other services to escalating security expenses.

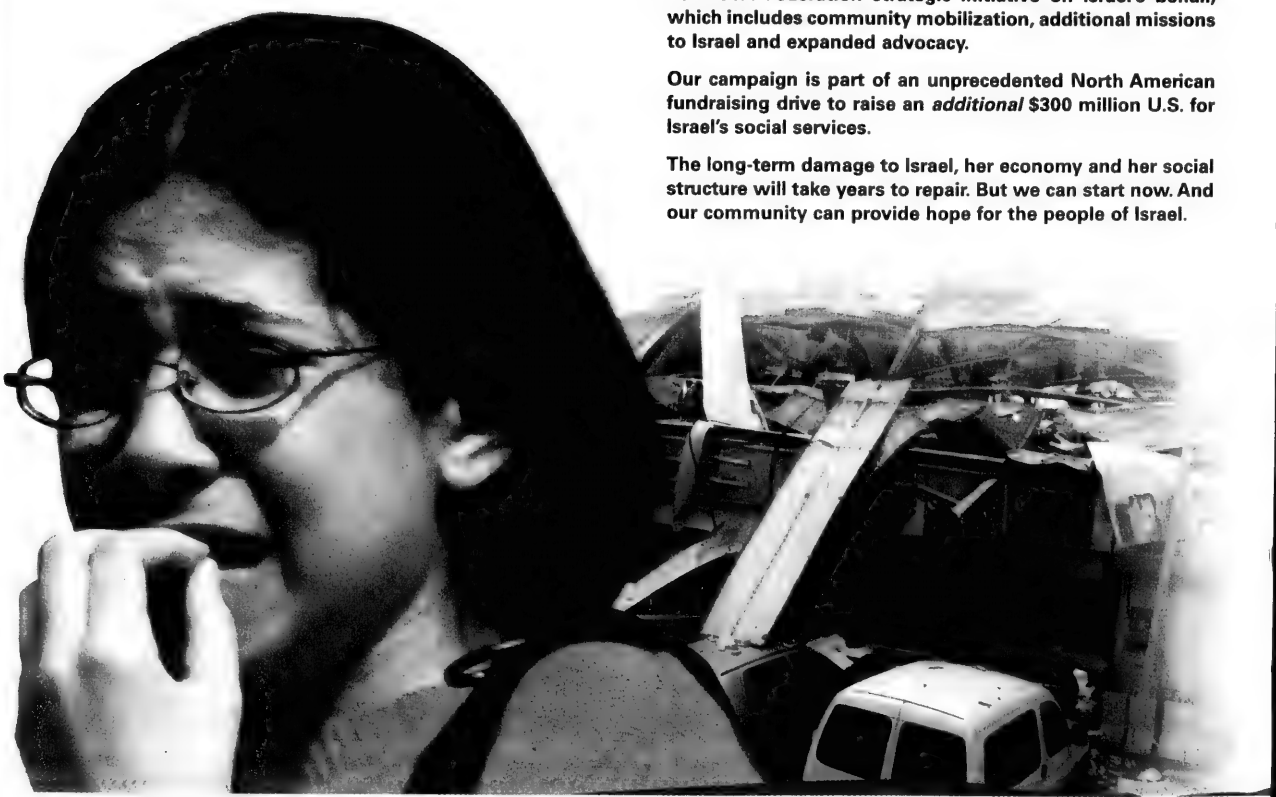
That's why we've taken the extraordinary decision to begin UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 now, four months ahead of schedule.

Your gift increase to Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 will be designated directly for social service programs in Israel on behalf of the vulnerable, including victims of terror.

Israel Emergency Campaign 2003 is the key component of a new UJA Federation strategic initiative on Israel's behalf, which includes community mobilization, additional missions to Israel and expanded advocacy.

Our campaign is part of an unprecedented North American fundraising drive to raise an additional $300 million U.S. for Israel's social services.

The long-term damage to Israel, her economy and her social structure will take years to repair. But we can start now. And our community can provide hope for the people of Israel.



UJA FEDERATION

ISRAEL EMERGENCY CAMPAIGN 2003

Our volunteers are mobilized.

Our commitment is strong.

Now we need you.

Please give generously.

McGill's new principal has strong ties to Israel

Her appointment breaks an important gender barrier

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Heather Munroe-Blum, McGill University's new principal, forged strong connections with Israeli universities while she was vice-president of the University of Toronto.

Munroe-Blum, whose appointment was officially announced last week, was hired by U of T in 1994 to take charge of research and international relations.

In this capacity, she strengthened U of T's academic ties with Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University, the Weizmann Institute and Al Quds University in east Jerusalem.

A 51-year-old convert to Judaism, she was born in Montreal, raised in Toronto and attended high school in Hamilton.

The first woman to be named McGill's principal, Munroe-Blum is a psychiatric epidemiologist by profession. She began her career in psychiatric social work.

Heather Monroe-Blum

Munroe-Blum, whose husband is a Hollywood screenwriter, will leave her position at U of T in June.

She will then take extensive French lessons in the hope of becoming fluently bilingual.

"This is an opportunity I welcome," she said in an interview. She can already speak and read French.

Munroe-Blum, who has a teenage daughter, takes up her duties at McGill on Jan. 1, 2003.

She has a renewable five-year contract.

She will succeed Bernard Shapiro, who retires in December after an eight-year term.

The chair of McGill's board of governors, Robert Rabinovitch, said Munroe-Blum is a "creative, innovative [and] decisive" person.

Asked whether she was surprised by McGill's decision to select a female principal for the first time in the university's 181-year history, she replied, "I didn't think a lot about that, but I was delighted to be chosen."

Noting that her appointment breaks an important gender barrier, Munroe-Blum said, "It's wonderful that the leadership of public and private institutions in Canada is becoming more diversified. But there is a lot more room to go further in that."

During her vice-presidency at U of T, support for research doubled.

In 1999, she was one of the authors of a provincial government report, Growing Ontario's Innovative System: The Strategic Role of University Research.

As a psychiatric epidemiologist, she led investigations into the distribution, prevention, course and treatment of major psychiatric disorders.

She also served on the Prime Minister's Advisory Council on Science and Technology's Expert Panel on Canada's Role in International Science and Technology.

Munroe-Blum, who lived in Montreal until the age of three, is the daughter of Donald and Dorothy Munroe. Her mother is deceased. Her father is a retired salesman.

She attended high school in Hamilton, obtained a BA and a bachelor's of social work degree from McMaster University, a master's degree in social work from Wilfrid Laurier University and a PhD in epidemiology from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Then she joined McMaster's faculty of health sciences.

Leonard, her husband, has written screenplays for such movies as Meatballs, Stripes and Feds.

She converted to Judaism when they were married in 1970.

"I've been Jewish much more of my life than not," she observed.

Their daughter, Sydney, is 16 and attends a private girls' school in Toronto.

Munroe-Blum has been actively involved in the Jewish community.

She is a member of the research committee of the Rotman Research Institute at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and is on a committee on the redevelopment of the Jewish community in downtown Toronto.

She is also associated with the Canadian Society of the Weizmann Institute and the Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation.

Her mother-in-law, Mary Blum Devor of Montreal, is a psychologist, who lives in Jerusalem part of the year.

Munroe-Blum's late father-in-law, Sidney, was a labour unionist, head of the Toronto Labour Committee and second national director of the Jewish Labour Committee in Montreal.

Glick kept composing despite illness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Srul Irving Glick, composer-in-residence and choir director at Beth Tikvah Synagogue for the past 32 years, lost a lengthy battle with cancer last week at age 67, but his spirit lives on in his music.

At his funeral last week, approximately 900 people paid tribute to Glick, and three choirs – the Beth Tikvah Choir, the Toronto Children's Chorus and the Amadeus Choir – performed his works.

Glick won several awards for the Judaic component of his music, among them the J.I. Segal Award for his contribution to Jewish music in Canada and the Kavod Award of the Cantors Assembly of America. He received a Governor General's medal for his contribution to Canadian culture in 1993, and was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada in 1994.

Obituary

Under Glick's guidance, Beth Tikvah won two awards from the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for the best musical program for a synagogue in North America.

Beth Tikvah's cantor Avraham Keller recalled being enriched by Glick's "capturing, heartwarming smile" and the twinkle in his eye. "Your giant soul has touched so many people and contributed in so many ways," he said. "Your music spoke so well for your neshamah, your soul."

As recently as a month ago, Glick was still composing, working on a piece about tikkun olam (healing the world), said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation, who co-officiated with Beth Tikvah's Rabbi Wayne Allen. "In his hospital room, he had his keyboard and his headphones… He was still hoping to be part of a major event in June and another in October."

Glick's work, which has been performed on at least five continents, involved the task of connecting people to God, said Rabbi Allen. "Srul was a God-intoxicated man, but he was not always that way. It took some disconnection from his roots to realize how important that was in his life. He ultimately found his way back."

He lived with a "total commitment of bringing God into his life and into the lives of others," said Rabbi Allen.

Born in Toronto, Sept. 8, 1934, Glick was one of the five children of Cantor David Glick and his wife Chaika. After completing two music degrees at the University of Toronto, he studied composition in Paris, France. A prolific composer, his work ran the gamut from klezmer to chamber music.

His compositions were infused with passion and mixed "the familiar melodies of our traditions with the grand struggle of reaching upward to God," said Rabbi Allen. Passion characterized Glick's life as well, said the rabbi. "He conducted with passion, he studied with passion, wrote with passion and he loved with passion."

After Glick returned to Toronto, he taught theory and composition at the Royal Conservatory of Music and at York University, and worked as a full-time music producer at the CBC from 1962 to 1986, with the exception of a sabbatical year spent in England and Israel.

In a January 2000 interview, Glick recalled his time at the CBC as very exciting. "We felt like we were building music in Canada…and that we were giving artists a chance to make their names and their careers," he told The CJN at the time.

Glick had "the gifts of depth of understanding and the power to see beyond the here," said his sister Elaine Carlebach. "Srul also received the gift of being the ultimate of whom he was meant to be," she said.

Carlebach recalled the captivating stories her brother told, his talent for painting, and his charm, sweetness, intensity and, sometimes, impatience. He brought out "the depth he knew we all had, always challenging until we shared the insight. Being with Srul was a constant feast. He was a true renaissance man."

Glick is survived by his wife Sara, children Julie, Paula and Stefan Glick; stepchildren Lisa Farun, Tobi Bongard and Daphna Wunch; grandson Matthew Bongard; brothers Earl, Norman, Danny, and his sister Elaine Carlebach.

Hazikaron service at Beth David

A standing-room only crowd joined the Consulate General of Israel in a Yom Hazikaron assembly held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue on April 15. Speakers included Meir Romem, Consul General of Israel; Zahavit Ben Hillel, Consul, State of Israel; and Rabbi Phillip Scheim of Beth David. After a moment of silence to begin the service, memorial candles were lit. Readings, poems songs and prayers commemorated the fallen soldiers. Green balloons were displayed at community Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in honour of the Israel Defence Forces. Seen is Romem with his wife, Rosalind.

JIAS works on UJA campaign, looks to own future

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vickie Dubrovsky, national president-elect of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and chair of JIAS Toronto, is a lot more confident about the future of JIAS Toronto than she was last fall.

Last October, a grass-roots group known as the Russian Jewish Initiative (RJI) convened a meeting to present an impassioned case that JIAS Toronto be allowed to continue as an independent agency. The group raised concerns about the possibility of JIAS being folded into another agency following the formation of a transition committee by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and JIAS Toronto to examine immigrant services and ways of integrating the agency more closely into the federation system.

The transition committee was disbanded after it made its recommendations and was replaced by a new committee that will focus on delivery of services to immigrants in Toronto.

Although discussions are still ongoing and the details have yet to be completely worked out, Dubrovsky is confident that JIAS has a future here. But, she said in a recent interview, "it would be arrogant to think only of ourselves right now."

Dubrovsky was referring to JIAS' involvement in UJA Federation's Campaign 2003, which is being launched four months ahead of schedule due to the situation in Israel.

JIAS Toronto, which according to acting executive director Mila Voihanski deals with 12 to 18 new families a week in formal intake sessions, has not been involved in the campaign in the past.

The Toronto area is home to about 45,000 Russian-speaking immigrants, Dubrovsky noted. With its connection to that sector alone, JIAS is able to reach roughly one quarter of Toronto Jewry, she said. "Traditionally, that's not the part of the community that has been [actively raising funds]."

Also, she noted, newcomers may be financially unable to give and the concept of tzedakah, other than to family and friends, varies from one country to another.

Voihanski noted, however, that the situation in Israel has prompted a "tremendous number" of phone calls from members of the immigrant community asking how they can help. "They still associate JIAS with the Jewish community, regardless of how long they've been here," she said.

JIAS has instituted its own fund so that people can donate to the general campaign directly through its office. They have also been in contact with local Russian-language media to let people know how they can support Israel here.

"We want to come across to the immigrant community as working with the federation," said Voihanski.

"Which we are," added Dubrovsky.

In the meantime, JIAS Toronto continues to operate as a branch of JIAS Canada, although ever since last summer, the Toronto and Montreal branches have been funded by their respective local federations, while money for JIAS Canada, which serves other Canadian cities, is funneled through UIA Federations Canada.

Roughly half JIAS Toronto's $1-million budget comes from UJA Federation, while the rest is government funding.

JIAS Toronto's fiscal year ends June 30, by which time negotiations with UJA Federation are expected to be wrapped up.

"We do understand that there needs to be an update," Voihanski said, referring to the needs of today's immigrants, who generally have a better grasp of Western economy and society than their counterparts who came from the Soviet Union 20 or 30 years ago.

Other possibilities for change include becoming more proactive in creating partnerships with other community agencies, Voihanski said.

"Things are still very much taking shape," said Ed Segalowitz, vice-president, community planning and development for UJA Federation.

"I can't give you a picture today, but I'm very positive and hopeful that we do have and will continue to have good quality services," he said. A stand-alone agency is "an idea that we've embraced and that we're heading towards."

VISITING IN ISRAEL: Mark Waldman, one of the chairs of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's new Jewish Venture Philanthropy Fund and new vice-chair of UJA's Major Gifts Division, recently participated in an emergency UJA leadership solidarity fly-in to Israel. While in Jerusalem, Waldman visited the Hadassah Hospital with Moti Mizrahi, a survivor of the March 9 attack at Moment Café. The 30-year-old Mizrahi suffered major injuries to his skull, a crushed and partially severed arm, and took shrapnel one centimetre from his aorta. Doctors call him a living miracle.

Rabbi and cantor show their solidarity

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two special guests davened at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on the eighth day of Passover.

Rabbi John Moscowitz and Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple took the short hop up Bathurst Street in order to show their solidarity with other Jews.

"Now more than ever it is time for all Jews to stand shoulder to shoulder in support of Israel. What unifies us as Jews is far more important than what separates us," said Rabbi Moscowitz.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, said the rabbi and cantor made an important statement by attending the services.

"Israel needs Diaspora Jews to stand together. It is necessary for the sake of the unity of Jewish people and for the centrality of Israel in our lives," he said.

Rabbi Shulman said they were warmly received by the congregants who were "touched by their presence in the synagogue."

Although there are usually a number of services going on at Shaarei Shomayim simultaneously, that day there was only one because he wanted everyone to say Yizkor together for the victims of terror in Israel, he said.

A list of victims was handed out, and all congregants were asked to stay and pray for "their extended family. It was that sentiment that made it particularly appropriate that Rabbi Moscowitz and Cantor Maissner be there," said Rabbi Shulman.

מנהיגת הפלנגה הדמוקרטית החדשה של קנדה, אלקסה מקדונף קבעה שכנסיית ישראל לערים ערביות וחיפוש הטרוריסטים היא נרעה לפחות כמו התאבדויות הטרוריסטים. מדובר באשה מהוגנת, בעלת חינוך טוב שקובעת שאסור לישראלים יהודים לחנן על חייהם בלי להיחשב לפושעים. איך זה ייתכן? הרי לא שמענו את הנברת מגנה את הטרור עצמו, ואם כן ניתתה, לא הניעו הדברים לתודעת הקהל. מסקנה: כדי שהשמאל הליבראלי יזדהה עם יהודים- על היהודים להתפוצץ קודם, או להישלח לתאי גאזים. אין בכל זה דבר חדש שלא ידענו, אבל צריך להודות שכוו עוצמה של בורות, שטאח וגועניות כבר לא ראיט הרבה זמן.

בהפגנה מול הקונסוליה הישראלית בטורונטו נכחו יהודים ופלשתינאים, מאה חמישים סך הכל. זה לא הפריע לנברת רחל גורמן לאמר לכתב "טורונטו סטאר" ש "החשתתפות הזו מראה את הדאגה הגוברת לנוכח האלימות הישראלית בשטחים". אתם תבנתם את זה? כל יום מתפוצץ טרוריסט ולוקח איתו ישראלים ומה שמדאיג אשה יהודיה, יתכן אפילו ישראלית, זה האלימות של צה"ל. מאיפה מוצאים את האנשים האלה? אחד ברק הציע לפלשתינאים בחיים את כל מה שהם עושים עבורו טרור עכשיו. מה המסקנה? הטרור הוא כלי פוליטי של האיסלם הבינלאומי. חבל שהליבראלים לא מבינים את זה. כשזה יגיע אליהם, כשמחבל יתפוצץ כאן זה יהיה מאד מאוחר. בוש דווקא תבין את זה לא רע. אבל גם עליו יש לחצים אדירים.

החיים הזולים יפורם שימעוני

באחד מערבי הפיצוחים של ששי התפתח ויכוח קולני בין ישראלים שהרעיד את קליפות הנהרעים. הנושא היה כמובן המורח התיכון ומאבק הדמים בינינו לבין בני הדודים. בלהט חילוקת דעותיי לאמר שקשה מאד להתמודד נגד אויב שלא מתרגש יותר מידי ממחיר הדמים שמשלמים בניו ובנותיו, ולמרות דעות התנין שוזלות מעיני הראיס ומקורבין, מסקר הקורבנות במאבק לשחרור פלשתין לא מזיז שערה אחת מוקנו הדליל של חבוט הנערך. מיותר לציין שדעתי לא היתה מקובלת בלשון חמעטה על משתתפי השיחה, רובם משכילים אזרחי הארץ הקדושה. המתווכחים טענו שאין חבדל בין אם יהודיה לאם ערביה, וכו"ל לגבי האבות. וזה נשמע נהיא נכון ונוגע ללב. חבל רק שאותם צדקים לא ראיים כיצד כל יום מופיעים הורים נאים של מתאבדים ובראש מורם מספרים לצופים בעיקר ברשתות טלביזיה ערביות, איזה כבוד נפל בחלקם וכמה ישמחו להקריב למען המטרה את בניהם ובנותיהם הנהדרים, וכידוע לכל הורה כזה יש הרבה נהדרים. מיותר לציין שעל תמורה כספית עבור כל מתאבד אין איש מדבר. ואם זה לא מעיד על כמה זולים חיי אדם מה כן. דוגמא נהספת לאהבת החיים אצל בני חדודים הם הלוויות בתך אנו חוזים יום יום באדיבות סי אן אן. על המסך הקטן ראיים כיצד נשא הקורבן על כתפיים חסונות כאשר מסביבו ים אדם. ומסביב לארון בתוך החמון חזועם בולטים דעולי פנים חמושים בכפיה וקלצ'ניקוב יורים אש שוטפת לעבר השחקים כאילו מישהו רוצה לחטל לחקת יונים או סתם לנקב את העננים. מאחר וכבר תמיד העדפתי את שעורי החתעמלות על מדעים, הידע שלי בפיזיקה צנוע, אך את חוק ניוטון אני זוכר מתקופת חילמודים בענין כוח המשיכה של כדור הארץ. אז במלים אחרות אותם קלעים שנורו, אחרי שסיימו לנקב את העננים, חוזרים בשרקה חדה לכוון האדמה, ויש להניח שתוך כדי מאצם הם נתקלים בים האבלים ובאותה הזדמנות מנקבים גם כמה ראשים או איברים אחרים. או לאלה שעדיין לא השתכנעו שחיי אדם אצל הפלשתינאים לא נחשבים- חבל על זמנם וחבל גם על זמני.

דברים שאמרה נולדה מאיר באותו ענין:

" יהיה שלום עם הערבים ברגע שהם יאהבו את ילדיהם יותר ממה שהם שונאים אותנו".

משהו טוב לפוף

בימים קשים כאלה, כשכל אחד מאיתנו קשוב, פוחד, כואב, מצלצל מוחה דמעה, מתייאש, היתה משהו טוב: אגא רגאגא, תקליט חדש של אריק איינשטין שיקח אתכם למקום טוב, אוחב, רך, נוסטאלי. מגיע לכם ליום העצמאות. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Cotler decries 'occupation' of his Montreal office

He said, "people chose not to exercise their right to speak and give expression to their grievance, but chose to enter under false pretenses, illegally occupy an MP's office, intimidate employees, and effectively assault the very values that underlie this free and democratic society."

Cotler said the group entered his office on the pretext that they were constituents looking for assistance. When it turned out they had come to protest Canadian foreign policy, Cotler said his staff agreed to talk to them.

"However, they rejected any discussion, announced that they wished to occupy the office, and told my staff to 'leave for your own security.'"

They had brought food and sleeping bags with them, indicating they were prepared for a long stay.

"My staff, consisting of a Québécoise, Irish-Canadian and Iranian-Canadian – a representative expression of a francophone and multicultural Quebec – insisted on remaining, saying that it was not for them to leave but for those who were occupying the office to do so."

The group refused and locked themselves in the boardroom. Police had to break down the door to remove them, but they reportedly did not resist arrest.

At the time of the incident, which lasted for about two hours, Cotler was delivering a statement on the Middle East in the House of Commons, which called for the withdrawal of the Israeli military from Palestinian towns, humanitarian aid to Palestinians, and eventually a Palestinian state, he said.

"But even if my statement had been less fair, this would not have countenanced the illegality committed. Those who occupied my office did not appear to care about my statements, or to peacefully discuss and protest Canadian foreign policy in the Middle East, which in yet another irony has been characterized by many Jews as being too critical of Israel," he said.

Second Cup issues apology

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Toronto-based head office of the Second Cup coffee chain issued a swift apology after an employee at one of its franchises in Montreal allegedly ordered three young women carrying Israeli flags out of the shop.

"Second Cup deeply regrets the incident that took place at the café at 1465 Crescent St... on April 17, 2002," the company said in a statement the following day.

"The actions of the individual in question in no way reflect Second Cup's operating philosophy. We do not tolerate negative comments or discrimination under any circumstances. We are investigating this incident further to ensure it never happens again and have reiterated our non-discrimination policy to all our cafés."

Alton McEwen, Second Cup CEO, told The CJN in a telephone interview from California that he had personally telephoned one of the three women, Lesley Sherman, 22, the day of the incident and issued a written apology to her and the others, Hila Sharabi, 24, and Zmira Shalva, 31.

News of the women's complaint circulated quickly after they e-mailed their version of events.

After participating in the April 17 Israel rally downtown, the three friends entered the Second Cup with small Israeli flags in their hands. One went toward the washroom but was allegedly told by the employee, whose name has not been released, that they would have to order first, said Sherman, a McGill University student.

The exchange then turned hostile, according to Sherman. "She said, 'We don't want you or 'that' in here, pointing to the flag. Then she said, 'You are all to blame for what is going on in the Middle East.'"

Sherman said she wants an apology from the employee as well, calling the incident "a blatant act of anti-Semitism," even though the woman did not use the word "Jews" or "Jewish."

McEwen told The CJN he could not comment at this time on what disciplinary action, if any, might be taken. He said the head office is reviewing the operations of this franchise.

"This is an unfortunate incident, something which we do not condone, but I think people should keep some perspective when we have so many great operators in Quebec," McEwen said.

Ottawa expresses solidarity with Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Record numbers turned out two nights in a row for Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut gatherings, to show their solidarity with Israel.

The community also donated over $25,000 to the emergency campaign for Israel during the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration.

The largest crowd ever, came to Congregation Machzikei Hadas for a Yom Hazikaron ceremony co-sponsored by the Embassy of Israel. Sombre readings interspersed with songs by Hillel Academy's students recalled those who have died defending Israel.

The memorial candle was lit by sisters Irit Beck and Noga Reiss, whose brother, Yoram, died on Jan. 11, 1972, while serving his country. Two sons of another brother are now serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

Gerry Levitz, the president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa, said we must honour the soldiers of Israel who have fought and died. "How can we honour them?" he asked. "One way is to celebrate what they have given us, the State of Israel, by participating in the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration."

Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon began his remarks with these statistics: "19,181 young men and women gave their lives in the last 54 years to defend the State of Israel. In the last two weeks, two dozen joined this parade of the fallen," he said. "They fell and sacrificed their lives in the fight against terrorism. When will this parade of the fallen end?... When are we going to be accepted? In the meantime, we have no other choice but to fight and to weep over the 19,181 young, brave men and women."

The following night at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, Divon told the audience of over 1,000, "You should all have your heads high, full of pride, and with your love, your devotion, your commitment and support, we shall continue enjoying a very flourishing and successful Medinat Yisrael."

CHOOSING THE BEST START

When Rhonda Cartoon went looking for a preschool for her daughter Jesse, 3½, she sat in on classes at four different schools. Cartoon, a private investigator, carefully examined the building, playground, quality of teaching instruments and even the configuration of the washrooms. "I was looking for the best possible environment and I hoped it would be a Jewish school. Once I got to Associated, I stopped my search.

"At Associated I found a warm, loving and caring environment with established teachers," says Cartoon. "They're very respectful of 'little people issues.' They treat each child as an individual and their experience enables them to work with the whole group."

Bet Hayeled (Preschool) supervisors Surie Nagel and Susan Herberman say, "Our goal is to give each child a positive first experience in schooling, to be nurturing and warm, and to welcome every family into the school no matter what their background." To make sure these "little people" get the very latest in educational advances, their curriculum follows the Ontario Ministry of Education's preschool curriculum.

At the Bet Hayeled, children get their foundation in Jewish learning. Shabbat and Chagim (holidays) are celebrated with songs, class trips, brachot (blessings) and tefillot (prayers). Children are taught to appreciate the land and people of Israel and to understand the importance of tzedakah (charity).

Classrooms are divided into a variety of activity centres, such as writing, math, blocks, painting, water and sand, and dramatic play. Children are encouraged to move freely from centre to centre, learning how to make choices and become independent thinkers. Carefully structured play allows children to work together, take turns and respect the feelings of others.

The computer programme starts in Junior Kindergarten. "It's not just about clicking and playing games," says Nagel. "It's about teaching children to understand computers and complete tasks."

Hands-on experiments with bubbles, magnets and electricity instill a curiosity for the natural world. The Early Years Music Programme, which combines instruments, musical theory and creative movement, provides an introduction to Hebrew and English songs. By the end of Kindergarten, children will recognize letter shapes and sounds in both English and Hebrew.

Older students act as role models for the younger children. Once a week, the Reading Buddy programme pairs preschoolers with older students for one-on-one storytelling and arts and crafts.

For parents like Cartoon, food allergies are a real concern. It was a relief to find out that Associated is a nut aware school. " I had the most confidence in their ability to understand this serious allergy," she says.

Should a child exhibit behavioural or academic exceptionalities, he or she will be referred to a staff consultant. A speech and language consultant can determine if speech therapy is needed. If a child displays emotional difficulties, Jewish Family and Child Service is called upon to work with staff and parents.

Cartoon is convinced that by choosing Associated, she has chosen the best start for her daughter Jesse. " I want her first schooling experience to be positive. My first impressions left me with such a good feeling that I enrolled her right then and there," she says.

There are over 260 students in Nursery and Junior Kindergarten in twelve classes at the Posluns (Neptune) and Kamin (Atkinson) campuses. For more information on choosing the best start for your child, please call: 905-889-3998.

'Mega' rally held in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In an outpouring of support for Israel, Montreal Jews last week gathered for a rally the likes of which the community has never experienced.

Young and old, hand in hand, in wheelchairs and Nikes and with voices raised in song and spirit, a crowd estimated at between 10,000 and 25,000 came to Phillips Square at noon April 17 and then marched west along René Lévesque Boulevard to Place du Canada to cheer Israel on its 54th birthday, listen to rousing speeches and affirm their solidarity with the Jewish State.

By any measure, it was the largest and most purely emotional outdoor show of solidarity with Israel ever put on by any Jewish community in Canadian history, said rally participant Rabbi Reuben Poupko.

"I just couldn't believe it," he told The CJN. "I thought there would be 7,000 or 8,000 people. But these numbers were just unbelievable."

Indeed, the two-hour rally under a brilliant, warm sun, seemed to come as a much-needed morale-booster for a Jewish community demoralized by suicide bombings and the frustration of seeing Israel cast around the world as the villain in its fight against terror.

"The State of Israel just has to survive," rally participant Phyllis Pinchuk said.

"We want Israel to know it is not alone," echoed Miriam Assouline-Rosenstein. "Most of my family lives there, and whatever we can do from far away, we want them to know we're here supporting them."

People draped themselves with huge Israeli flags, waved thousands of smaller flags, sang, danced and held placards in support of Israel and peace. A small plane flew over the throng, trailing the sign: "Stand tall for Israel."

At Place du Canada, the huge crowd repeatedly punctuated speakers' remarks with cheers and impromptu bursts of singing and applause. The event's main speaker, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior, vowed that Jews will not be cowed by terror.

"We came here to say yes to peace, no to terror, no to death," said Israel Singer, executive director of the World Jewish Congress. "That is the message the Montreal Jewish community is sending to the world. We will be victorious!" As the crowd continued to roar, Rabbi Poupko defended the conduct of the IDF in its hunt for terrorists in the midst of worldwide condemnation.

"Their hearts are pure and their hands are clean," Rabbi Poupko said of the IDF. "The Jewish people and the Jewish State are here to stay."

Dignitaries at the rally included representatives from the federal and municipal governments and several ethnic organizations.

The appearance of several dozen pro-Palestinian and haredi anti-Zionist protesters at Phillips Square, the latter of whom wielded virulently anti-Israel signs and engaged in a few bitter verbal exchanges with some of the pro-Israel ralliers, threatened to tarnish the event.

However, their marginal presence did not appear to affect the overall spirit.

1,000 turn out in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — About 1,000 people rallied outside Beth Israel Synagogue on Sunday in support of Israel, demonstrating an outpouring of passion for the Jewish State.

The crowd that showed up near Oak Street was clearly unanimous in its support, carrying banners, waving Israeli flags and, as the rally ended, singing songs of peace.

The rally was organized by the Israel Action Committee for the Lower Mainland (IAC), a group that was founded a year ago and is now supported by the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the Canada-Israel Committee.

"People sit at home and watch television and they see what's happening and they see the commentary, and at such times there's a real urge to get together as a community and communicate our solidarity with the people of Israel," said IAC co-chair Michael Elterman. "There's also an urge to send a message to our government that remaining a true friend at these times is very important to us as a community. The rally accomplished that."

"We were expecting a good turnout, but we were overwhelmed by the numbers and by the calibre of the crowd," said IAC co-chair Naomi Frankenburg.

"They came with banners and flags, full of enthusiasm, concern and love for the State of Israel. It was the biggest rally the Jewish community of Greater Vancouver has ever had, and I hope it sent a message of our desire for peace."

Speakers included Jonathan Berkowitz, who spoke on behalf of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, Rev. Ken Smith and Israeli Ambassador Haim Divon.

Divon told the community to remain "strong and tough," saying that the Israeli Defence Forces had no alternative but to fight against the terrorism of Palestinian suicide bombers.

Jordana Corenblum, youth director at Beth Israel, said she was impressed by the presence of young Jews and by the many Christians who turned up, carrying signs that read "Christians Support Israel."

But she added that she nevertheless felt helpless. "I wish there was something more proactive we could do than carry signs, rally, sing and dance."

A second rally in the city was held later the same day by a coalition of local Palestinian groups. They gathered outside a fund-raising dinner held by the Jewish National Fund (JNF), and according to Frankenburg, the group was "screaming for blood."

Hana Kawas, who spoke on behalf of the Canada-Palestine Support Network, was quoted as saying that the State of Israel and the JNF have for years planted the seeds of apartheid in the Middle East, by dispossessing native Palestinians and instituting discriminatory land laws.

"The contrast between the two rallies was very dramatic and impressive," Frankenburg said.

Camp Ramah honours Hamilton couple

By JULIA KOLLEK
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — For the past 48 summers, Rabbi Israel Silverman and his wife Gloria have never gone away for a vacation.

Instead, they have devoted their time to generations of Camp Ramah campers and staff, particularly at camp in Utterson in the Muskoka region of Ontario.

But this summer will be different.

Rabbi Silverman, rabbi emeritus at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Synagogue, and his wife, a longtime community volunteer and former principal of the Beth Jacob Hebrew School, have decided to leave the Camp Ramah family. In recognition of their dedication, the camp will be honouring them with a lunch at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue in Toronto on April 28.

The Silvermans still plan to go up to camp for the first week this coming summer, "but our lives are different now," explained Gloria.

"We want to spend some time with our family, and we want to travel, as we've never been able to take time to do that before."

Ruth Slater, director of development for Camp Ramah in Toronto, said the Silvermans have left an indelible mark on camp life.

"Having that continuity is unique," Slater said. "They really personified the camp spirit that the best way to teach Judaism is to live it, and they helped to bring a strong Hamilton presence at the camp which has been an important part of our growth.

"People see them as parents to our campers. They certainly shaped my Ramah experience when I was young, and over the years they raised generations of campers there – including their own children and grandchildren."

As camp rabbi, Rabbi Silverman was involved with every realm of Jewish education at the camp, including supervising teaching, services, and overseeing kashrut.

Gloria trained counsellors and staff, and was especially involved in integrating Judaism into the camp's arts activities.

"Gloria brought the most amazing artists to Ramah. They always took the notion of art and were trained to take it into the Jewish context, which allowed campers to experience it this way. The children didn't just do pottery – they learned how to make everyday Judaica like mezuzot and challah boards," Slater said.

Sheldon Disenhouse, chair of Camp Ramah's board, recalled the impact the Silvermans had on him when he was a Ramah staff member 20 years ago.

"Rabbi Silverman guided me on religious issues, and Gloria was such a good sounding board. You knew that she had so much knowledge and experience behind her.

"I still remember taking a walk at camp with her and telling her some of the problems I was struggling with in my job there. The guidance she gave me as a teen have helped me in my role as lay leader at Ramah today," said Disenhouse.

Reflecting on what she has accomplished, Gloria said: "Camp Ramah models Jewish life, and it isn't just the children who learn. Our teen counsellors and adult teaching staff learn too. This includes a large number of Israelis, and being at Camp Ramah changed their approach to Judaism, because in Israel the tendency is to be either secular or religious.

"Camp Ramah helped them to see a different kind of Judaism that they had never experienced before, and many of them went back and joined Masorti, the Conservative movement in Israel, as a result," she said.

"I'm sure there will be a big hole in our lives when we leave Ramah, but we will still be in contact, and that is very important to us."

Proceeds from the luncheon will go toward expanding the camp's facilities. For details and to RSVP, contact the Camp Ramah office at 416-789-2193.

JERUSALEM — There were some who saw an element of poetic justice in Israel's capture of Palestinian militia leader Marwan Barghouti, on the eve of Israel's Remembrance Day for fallen soldiers.

Leader of the Fatah Party's Tanzim militia, Barghouti, 42, has become a symbol – and co-ordinating force – of the Palestinian intifadah against Israel, which has claimed the lives of 469 Israeli soldiers and civilians since it began in September 2000.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon vowed that Barghouti would be tried for involvement in the murder of Israelis. He said Barghouti's trial would "be one of the greatest achievements of Operation Defensive Wall," the Israeli military campaign against terrorists in Palestinian cities that was launched at the end of March following a month of increasingly deadly suicide attacks.

When Sharon learned of Barghouti's capture, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported, he told close associates that he would have preferred to receive Barghouti's ashes in an urn. The reference was to Israel's trial and conviction of Nazi Adolph Eichmann, who was tried and hung and whose ashes were then strewn outside Israel's territorial waters.

With Palestinian groups already threatening retaliation, however, other observers suggested that Israel's seizure of Barghouti and a subsequent trial would only strengthen his standing among Palestinians and bring more grief to Israel. The military wing of Hamas said Israel's arrest of Barghouti had turned Israeli leaders, including Sharon, into legitimate targets.

Some senior Israeli security officials reportedly believe that instead of being put on trial, Barghouti should be expelled.

About one thing there was no debate: The April 15 capture of Barghouti in his Ramallah apartment hideout was a coup for Israeli intelligence and security forces.

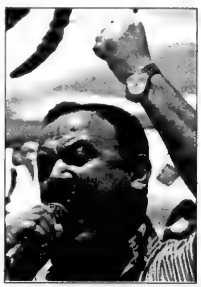
Barghouti went underground when Israeli troops invaded Ramallah at the beginning of Operation Defensive Wall on March 29. He was wanted by Israel, which claimed that Barghouti was closely involved in planning, directing and financing terrorist attacks.

At one point, Barghouti was believed to have taken cover with other wanted Palestinians in the Ramallah-area office of the Palestinians' West Bank security chief, Jibril Rajoub. When that group surrendered, however, Barghouti was not among them.

On April 15, Israeli security forces received a tip that Barghouti was hiding in a friend's apartment in the Ramallah neighbourhood of A-Tira, not far from Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's compound.

Israeli troops and special units quickly surrounded the building, calling on occupants to come out.

Most left of their free will. Following them, Barghouti's nephew Ahmed, a Tanzim militant also wanted for terrorist activity, surrendered.



Marwan Barghouti

Ahmed Barghouti told investigators that his uncle had fled when he suspected Israeli security forces were closing in. Another resident sent back to the building said Barghouti was not there.

Not believing the claims, members of a special unit entered the building. At the same time, troops outside spotted Barghouti by one of the building's windows, and Barghouti then gave himself up.

For months, even as it targeted other Palestinians who were organizing terrorist attacks, Israel declined to go after Barghouti because of his tremendous popular support.

As Shin Bet officials questioned Barghouti this week, he insisted he was a political figure and not a terrorist.

But the Israeli army described Barghouti as head of the Tanzim militia and founder of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade, a terrorist group that has carried out some of the most brutal attacks of recent months, killing scores of Israelis and wounding hundreds.

The head of Israeli army intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, said Barghouti was known to have directed, encouraged and financed terrorist activities, including the dispatch of suicide bombers.

Israeli security officials linked Barghouti to numerous attacks in which more than a dozen Israelis were killed, including a shooting attack at a bat mitzvah celebration in Hadera, a shooting spree on Jerusalem's Jaffa Road and a shooting at a Tel Aviv restaurant.

Israeli officials also want to examine Barghouti's relationship with Arafat to determine how much Arafat knew about Tanzim terrorist attacks and how involved in them he was.

Documents confiscated during the anti-terror campaign show that funds Barghouti received, including allocations authorized by Arafat, were used to finance attacks by West Bank terror cells, the army says.

Once considered a possible moderate successor to Arafat, Barghouti's views became more extreme in the intifadah. Heading an association of various groups involved in the uprising, Barghouti evolved into an outspoken advocate of armed struggle to achieve Palestinian aims.

According to Ha'aretz, it was Barghouti who recognized that Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings were gaining popularity even among secular Palestinians, and steered Tanzim toward the same methods.

"This is the intifadah of peace. I'm serious. This intifadah will lead to peace in the end," Barghouti was quoted as saying earlier this year. "We need to escalate the conflict. It will be hard. Many of us will be killed, but there is no choice. Every one of us is willing to sacrifice himself."

Barghouti also had no patience for Israel's refusal to negotiate under fire. Not only was violence compatible with peace talks, he told the New York Times several months ago, it was the best way to ensure that Israel accepted Palestinian demands at the bargaining table.

Barghouti first became politically active in the Fatah youth movement in the 1970s. Later, at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank, he served as head of the student council.

In the early 1980s Barghouti was arrested for terrorist activities and spent six years in Israeli jail, where he learned Hebrew. He was released in 1987 and deported to Jordan.

He remained politically active and ultimately joined Arafat and the PLO leadership in Tunis.

In 1994, in the wake of the Oslo accords, Barghouti returned to the West Bank and was elected to the Palestinian legislative council as a representative from the Ramallah district. But he was not a member of the Palestinian cabinet, and was critical of the Palestinian Authority's rampant corruption.

Barghouti built popular support by organizing regional meetings of Fatah branches in the West Bank. Under his leadership, Barghouti transformed the Tanzim in the intifadah from a kind of civil guard to a militia carrying out shooting and bombing attacks against Israelis.

At times, it also appeared that the Tanzim's violent agenda under Barghouti challenged Arafat's occasional calls for a ceasefire and demonstrated a power struggle between the two Palestinians.

But many Israelis believed that Arafat never was sincere when he called for ceasefires, and used the Tanzim to carry out terror attacks he could not sponsor directly.

Yom Ha'atzmaut in Jerusalem

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Israel's official 54th Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day) celebration began at sunset last Tuesday at Har Herzl in Jerusalem with the annual torch-lighting ceremony. More than 3,000 people attended.

The dramatic, colourful ceremony on the wooded western crest of Jerusalem was in marked contrast to the subdued celebrations throughout the rest of the country. Most public celebrations were scaled back; some municipalities even cancelled their celebrations altogether.

The evening was cool; a strong breeze blew hard from the west, and the clouds threatened rain. But the three-sided makeshift stands that faced the black basalt grave of Theodor Herzl were filled to capacity more than an hour before the ceremony began.

A fanfare of brass and bugle brought us all to attention. In crisp, synchronized formation, wearing their dark ceremonial uniforms, the Knesset Guard marched sprightly into the stadium from the east. Soldiers smartly carried the standards and colours of the various units of the armed forces. The crowd immediately joined the cadence of the march, clapping loudly and long in rhythmic beat to the music and the marchers' steps.

It was remarkable to see and to hear. It was also likely the only place on earth where an audience would become involved with the formality and austerity of a military tattoo. I cannot imagine, for example, the Queen's Rifles in Ottawa or the U.S. Marine Corps in Washington encouraging audience participation. Yet here in Jerusalem, the audience was as much a part of the ceremony as the bright, snappy display of flags and soldierly movement.

The feet-stomping, back-slapping, hand-clapping accompaniment by the audience redefined the procession. It was not a formal parade of soldiers in ceremonial uniforms; it was rather a homey, entertaining, "full-of-nachas" party by and for the children soldiers.

The Speaker of the Knesset, Avraham Burg, delivered a strong, impassioned message to the assembly. As every other public person had done that day in the their respective ceremonies, he made reference to the "situation."

"This year's celebration," he began, "is touched by sadness and anxiety." But he soon soared with poetic force when he promised the audience that "we will win this war because we cherish life above all. And in the struggle with those who revile life, we, who choose to live, shall always win the day."

At the end of his speech, Burg lit the central beacon from which the other twelve large torches received their flame. As soon as the central beacon was lit, the stadium erupted into cheering and more rhythmic applause. It was a cathartic moment for a people that was just finished marking Yom Hazikaron and now moving on to Yom Ha'atzmaut, "emoting" through yagon to simchah, from sorrow to happiness.

The celebration had now begun.

The theme of this year's torch-lighting ceremony was Children and Youth: Our Future and Our Strength. Twelve torches, representing the idealized unity of the twelve tribes of Israel, were lit, each by a different child.

The young torch-lighters represented the wide range of Israeli society: observant, non-observant; city-dwellers, kibbutznikim; newly-arrived, sabra; physically challenged, physically whole; Jewish, Muslim. One of the children was the son of a soldier killed this year during fighting. Another was herself the victim of a terrorist attack. Each torch-lighter told a little bit of themselves and of the values or the people on whose behalf the torch was being dedicated.

Each also pledged to the assembly that they were lighting the torch and affirming the values that each torch embodied l'tifferet medinat Yisrael, "for the glorification of the State of Israel."

As the final torch was lit, an enormous surge of emotion rose from the audience. Older people shed tears; younger ones whooped, cheered and called out with obvious delight.

The program ended with a display of fireworks and, in typical Israeli fashion, an invitation to the entire assembly to join with more than 100 youngsters who were suddenly swirling and twirling and leading folk dances on the floor of the makeshift theatre.

The audience only reluctantly disbanded later, walking slowly towards the street, trying to hold on as long as possible to the sense of celebration that has evaded them and their fellow countrymen for so long.

Earlier in the day there had been another reason to celebrate. It was announced that despite the "situation," 212 immigrants from Argentina had arrived at Ben Gurion Airport to start a new life. More than 500 more were expected by the end of the week.

They, too, would one day be able to pledge their commitment l'tifferet medinat Yisrael.

The writer was in Israel last week as a guest of the Ministry of Tourism and El Al Israel Airlines.

A SPECIAL GIFT: Two special immigrant flights from Argentina arrived in Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut to mark 54 years of aliyah. Since the establishment of the State of Israel, 2,902,200 immigrants have arrived in the country. The immigrants who arrived on Independence Day will be absorbed in Jewish Agency absorption centres and in towns and cities throughout Israel. Jewish Agency chair Sallai Meridor said this group is the most important gift Israeli society received for Independence Day and that aliyah contributes to Israel's national strength.

The Week in Israel

April 15

• The European Union (EU) will not convene to review its trade agreement with Israel, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said. In a conversation with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Straw said Israel would not face EU economic sanctions because of its military operation in the West Bank, as several EU states had threatened in recent days.

April 16

• The UN Food and Agriculture Organization says hunger and malnutrition are on the rise in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. "All available information points to a major catastrophe under way," the Rome-based agency said in a "special alert" highly critical of Israel.

April 17

• Israeli troops arrested 20 Jews who entered Joseph's Tomb in Nablus in defiance of army orders. Israel Radio said dozens of others were also arrested en route to the site. The compound has been under Palestinian control since it was seized by armed Palestinians in the fall of 2000.

April 18

• Israeli forces apprehended Hamas operative Husam Badran, a leader of the Hamas military wing in Nablus. Badran was detained and three other Palestinians were killed in an Israeli army operation in a village north of Nablus.

April 19

• Saudi Arabia's foreign minister blamed Israel for the failure of the U.S. peace mission. Prince Saud al-Faisal said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's policies blocked attempts to stop the violence, ruining the mission by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell to secure a Middle East cease-fire.

Germany suspects terrorism in Tunisian shul blast

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — Echoing the suspicions of Israeli officials, Germany has taken the lead in investigating whether a truck explosion at a Tunisian synagogue was a terrorist attack.

On April 15, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said the April 11 explosion on the Tunisian island of Djerba may have been deliberate.

"There are indications of an attack, but no final certainty," Schroeder said. The possibility reinforced the need to keep up the fight against global terror, he added.

That same day, German police arrested a man suspected of involvement in the explosion. The suspect was taken into custody in the western German city of Duisburg following a tip about a phone call made before the attack.

Fifteen people, 10 of them German tourists, were killed after a truck filled with natural gas reportedly crashed into the historic Ghriba Synagogue.

Tunisian officials sought to downplay the incident as a routine traffic accident, but Israel's foreign ministry said almost immediately that it was a terror attack.

A foreign ministry source said Israel had no hard proof, but noted that the synagogue is in an isolated place.

"To get there, you have to want to get there," the source said.

Tunisia ordered the wall that the truck crashed into – which was a likely source of evidence for an investigation – painted over within hours.

General view of the damage to the synagogue in Djerba. [Reuters/RSN photo]

Witnesses also voiced suspicions that the incident at the synagogue was intentional and was linked to ongoing Israeli-Palestinian violence, which has sparked attacks on Jewish interests across Europe.

The blue-and-white synagogue, located in the middle of an olive grove, is built on the foundations of one of the oldest synagogues in Africa and is a site of pilgrimage for Jews.

According to tradition, Jews first came to Djerba in biblical times, bringing a stone from the ancient temple of Jerusalem that is kept in a grotto at the synagogue.

An estimated 3,000 Jews live in Tunisia, about 1,000 of them on the island of Djerba. It is one of the oldest Jewish communities in the world, dating back more than 2,000 years.

Tunisia is a popular European vacation destination, and its Jewish sites attract many German visitors. The German foreign ministry said last week it was not putting out a travel advisory at this time.

Tunisian officials and local Jewish community leaders have been reluctant to see the explosion as anything but an accident.

At stake are both Tunisia's reputation as a tourist haven and as a place where Jews and Muslims live together peacefully.

But even the Tunisian government conceded last week that it was pursuing leads beyond its original "tragic accident" theory.

German authorities, meanwhile, are interviewing survivors of the explosion in hopes of finding clues.

The blast occurred as a busload of German tourists was visiting the synagogue. Also killed were a French citizen and four Tunisians, one of them a tour guide.

Tunisian officials initially said the driver of the truck was among the dead and that his body had been burned beyond recognition, but this was countered by witness accounts.

Survivor Helmut Eckert of Berlin, who was interviewed in Germany by the Federal Crime Bureau, said he had seen a small delivery truck parked in front of the entrance to the synagogue.

"A man got out, closed the doors. He walked away quickly toward the neighboring houses. Seconds later, the truck exploded. That must have been the perpetrator," Eckert told reporters.

Siegfried Muller, an eyewitness from Hamburg, said it definitely was not an accident. He said he saw the truck parked at the entrance before the tourist bus arrived.

German witnesses described the driver of the truck as about 30 years old, with short hair, wearing blue overalls with splashes of paint on them.

German journalists appear convinced that this was a terror attack.

Some reports discussed how the incident could bring the issue of terrorism home to Germans.

Other reports suggested that Germany should play a larger role in trying to resolve the Middle East crisis, because of the possibility of increased violence in Europe.

Still others assessed the possible damage to Tunisia's tourist industry.

The Berliner Morgenpost said the event's effect on tourism is secondary compared to its potential damage to the relationship between Tunisia's Jews and Muslims.

The Frankfurter Rundschau reported that Jews, Muslims and political leaders in Tunisia are desperate to believe this was not an anti-Semitic attack.

The explosion shocked people in Tunisia, the paper reported. A day after the explosion, the paper said, Muslims and Jews were trying to comfort one another in front of the synagogue.

Canada's war crimes efforts rate a 'B'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If the investigation and prosecution of Nazi war criminals were a subject in school, Canada's performance would rate no higher than a B, according to a report release recently by the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Jerusalem.

In the period Jan.1, 2001 to March 31, 2002, Canada stripped three Nazi collaborators of their citizenship and continued to investigate 78 others, states Efraim Zuroff, author of the Wiesenthal Center's Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals, An Annual Status Report.

Although legal steps against war criminals is hardly a school subject, the report uses an A-to-F ranking system to evaluate national efforts and results achieved during the period in question.

Canada, along with Germany and Poland, fell in category B, "those countries which have taken the necessary measures to enable the proper investigation and prosecution of Nazi war criminals and have registered at least a moderate degree of success."

Wasyl Odynsky, Helmut Oberlander and Michael Baumgartner were all stripped of their citizenship in 2001, while Canada began proceedings to denaturalize Michael Seifert, a Vancouver resident. Seifert was convicted of war crimes in absentia by an Italian court.

Joining Canada with scores of B were Germany, which convicted two SS men of murder and Poland, which sentenced Henryk Mania, a guard at the Chelmno death camp, to eight years in jail for the crime of genocide.

The only country to rate an A was the United States, which either denaturalized or deported six nazi collaborators and which maintains 175 ongoing investigations.

Altogether, 454 investigations of Nazi war criminals are proceeding in 11 countries.

Four countries shared the dubious distinction of receiving an F, led by Syria, which has consistently refused to prosecute Alois Brunner or turn him over to any of the five European countries which have requested his extradition.

Brunner, who lives in Damascus, "bears direct responsibility for the deportation to Nazi death camps of 128,500 Jews from Austria, Greece, France and Slovakia," the report states.

Sweden, Venezuela and Colombia join Syria on the F list. A statute of limitations on murder prevents Sweden from doing anything about the many suspected war criminals who have found refuge there, while the two South American nations have refused to even respond to queries about suspects.

Despite the disappointments from some quarters, Zuroff notes that "efforts to prosecute Nazi war criminals continue and have even considerably increased in recent years."

Zuroff states that the Wiesenthal Center has lobbied reluctant nations to act against suspected war criminals and that action only results when "political will" exists alongside a receptive political climate and the existence of good evidence.

"The period under review was marked by an unusually high number of convictions obtained from different countries... Not surprisingly, with one exception, every court victory achieved in these cases was won in countries which have established special units or agencies dedicated to this specific objective."

Zuroff states that many of the court cases took place in "countries of refuge" like Canada and the United States, where suspects fled after the war.

Great Britain and Australia, meanwhile, achieved "dismal results," reflecting "their longstanding failure to effectively deal with the presence in their countries of numerous Nazi collaborators."

Under pressure from the Wiesenthal Center and other sources, Zuroff said the three post-Communist Baltic states have taken modest steps against local suspects, but too often it is token action against elderly men too frail to stand trial.

Zuroff was particularly critical of Austria, where "there has been absolutely no progress made and the country remains one of the least likely to prosecute any of its many unprosecuted Holocaust perpetrators."

European Jews to set up center to fight anti-Semitism

BY SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — European Jews are to set up a special centre to respond to anti-Semitic attacks and anti-Israel incitement, during an emergency meeting of the World Jewish Congress convening in Brussels this week.

The proposal calls for a European Jewish Information Centre modelled on the pro-Israel lobby AIPAC, that would respond in an organized and focused manner to outbreaks of anti-Semitism in Europe.

It is expected to win approval at the congress, which would allocate tens of thousands of Euros to the project.

The new centre is also expected to respond to what it sees as unfair media coverage of Israel and to provide background information on the Israeli-Arab conflict. It also plans to operate a Web site with updated information on current events.

Some 1,000 participants from 25 countries are expected to attend the conference, where they will be presented with a working paper on setting up such a lobby, including budgets, means of operation and the new body's mission.

The working paper states that the establishment of such a lobby is necessary due to rising threats against Jews, particularly in Western Europe, coupled with the worsening security situation in Israel from terrorism.

Meanwhile, three Jewish lawyers in two southern French towns became the latest victims of a spate of anti-Semitic attacks in France when they received letters threatening to "gas" them, police sources said yesterday.

"Dirty Jew. Because of [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon and your racist intentions, you will be gassed on April 20," read one of the letters received on Friday by a lawyer in Montpellier and another one in Avignon.

The date cited in the letter is an apparent reference to the anniversary of Adolf Hitler's birthday. Montpellier police are investigating the incident.

A police source said about a dozen Jewish lawyers in the Midi region in southern France had received anti-Semitic letters.

French police are now counting 10 to 12 anti-Semitic attacks daily, even in traditionally peaceful ethnic melting pots like the Mediterranean port city of Marseilles.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre, which monitors global neo-Nazi activity, last week issued an advisory to its members urging "extreme caution" when traveling to France and Belgium.

India is a world unto itself

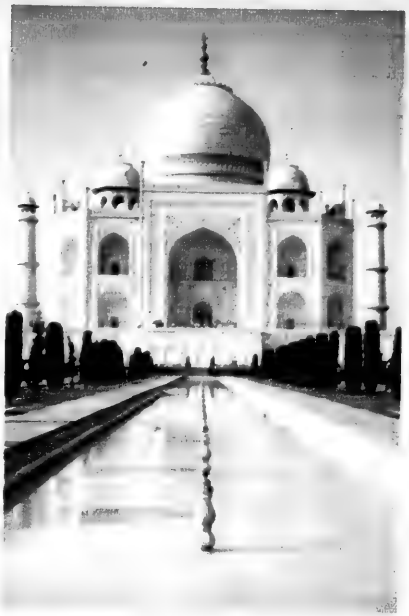
By
SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

NEW DELHI — India is a feast for the eyes and an extravaganza for the senses, a nation the size of a continent whose sharply-etched contrasts are never less than jolting.

From the teeming bazaars of New Delhi to the pristine foothills of the Himalayas, India offers a cornucopia of rich, unforgettable travel experiences.

Never having been to India, whose logistical challenges are awesome, I decided that an organized tour would be most feasible. Looking for one that would be economical yet comprehensive, I chose Toronto-based Gap Adventures' three-week Sacred India odyssey, packaged by Intrepid Travel (www.intrepidtravel.com/aasia).

Promising an overview of India's northern rim, Sacred India delivered, exposing me to a small group adventure that left me physically and mentally exhausted.



The Taj Mahal [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

We – myself and 10 others ranging in age from 21 to about 60 – visited an array of places: Hindu holy cities radiating religious piety, charming mountain redoubts where the air was cool and refreshing, and a Muslim village deep in a forest that was preoccupied by a joyous life-cycle ceremony.

We also visited the sublime Taj Mahal, as well as a remote game park rife with tigers and cities with frenetic outdoor markets and stirring Islamic monuments.

In addition, we ventured into a sleepy town whose abandoned palace is now dominated by a colony of monkeys, and we relaxed in a lakeside resort crawling with foreign, and especially Israeli, backpackers.

Spicing up the itinerary was a thrilling whitewater rafting ride on the snaking, swirling Ganges River.

Throughout our travels, India continually bombarded us with striking images that induced no small measure of culture shock: the claustrophobic crowds spilling out of every urban pore, the monumental traffic jams and the fetid open sewers whose stench was only partially offset by wisps of burning incense.

Nor will I forget the armies of beggars in rags and saris, some horribly disfigured; the heartbreaking poverty afflicting the country; the terribly congested second-class compartments of Indian trains – a peek into Dante's inferno – and the hopelessly rutted roads connecting India's farflung states.

As a westerner, I was always surprised by the incongruous sight of cattle, revered in Hinduism, meandering lazily through the streets, and of packs of wild pigs foraging in mounds of garbage. And who can forget the site of a gentle, lumbering elephant being led down a busy street by his keeper?

I will always remember the shouts of tea vendors vigorously calling out, "Hello chai, hello chai," or the baby-falsetto wailing of Hindi female singers.

The memory of dusty rickshaw drivers – the wretched of the earth who peddle furiously in the heat for pennies – and of sadhus, who have renounced all forms of materialism and live off alms, are still fresh in my mind.

Also memorable were the nimble, acrobatic monkeys who brazenly grabbed buttered toast from my breakfast plate, and cavalierly returned for more, and the spectacle of men relieving themselves in full view of indifferent passersby.

My introduction to India was New Delhi, whose main point of interest, for me, was the cacophonous Chandni Chowk, the old shopping district.

Amid the chaos, I let myself be carried forward by surging crowds toward the pungent spice market, the book dealers, the handicraft shops and the textile emporiums.

In Haridwar and Varanasi, both on the banks of the sacred Ganges, I watched bathers on ghats (steps leading to the water's edge) cleansing themselves of their worldly sins, and Hindu priests in saffron robes launching magical leaf-like vessels, bearing lit candles, into the night.

Mornings in Varanasi, a centre of the silk industry, began with the low chant of Hindu prayers and the rites of street barbers plying their trade.

Just outside Haridwar, in the sedate compound of a Jain temple, I saw a woman with a broom sweeping furiously so no one would accidentally step on a wayward insect. The Jains, one of India's numerous religious sects, believe no living thing should come to harm.

In Nainital and Rishikish (which hosted the Beatles during their 1960s pilgrimage), I ran into aging American and European hippies, meditated in ashrams and temples and admired the so-called snow view – the crystalline snow-capped mountains of the Indian Himalayas brooding in the far distance.

We spent a night and part of a day in a Sunni Muslim village, near Rishikish, partaking in wedding festivities and enjoying a special meal of cold buffalo milk (sweet and nutty), plain white rice, mashed vegetables and chipati.

In Agra, a dilapidated city of no appeal and aggressive touts, I came face to face with the majestic Taj Mahal, a marvel of 17th century fantasy Moghul architecture.

And in Corbett park, a wildlife preserve established in 1936, I spotted deer, monkeys and elephants in the wild, but alas, no tigers.

Jaipur, a jewel in Rajasthan's crown, was surely one of the highlights, a pink-walled city of fabulous markets and the site of the Hawa Mahal, the pink-orange facade of a Moghul palace often featured in official Indian travel literature.

Jaipur was also the home of the inimitable Akram K., an antique dealer and free spirit who asked me to write a love letter for him. The object of his undying affection was a British nurse with whom he had a romantic fling six months earlier.

Lucknow offered the ruins of the Residency – a British compound where a 19th century revolt broke out, heralding the rise of the Indian independence movement – and the Imambara, a Shiite Muslim complex of uncommon beauty.

Bundi commanded attention by virtue of its crumbling hillside palace, now the unofficial residence of a pack of monkeys.

Pushkar, with its Western atmosphere, funky cafes and amazing fabric shops, was a haven of relaxation and a hub of Israeli tourists.

In short, India – planet India – was a world unto itself, an endless revelation that constantly held me in thrall.

Lonely Planet's guidebook on India, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, is concise and useful.

Israel Philharmonic soloists to visit Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — Eight soloists of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (IPO) are making their first trip to Toronto to perform a program of music ranging from popular Broadway tunes to classsical masterpieces.

The concert, a Canadian premiere, will take place May 15, at York University, Burton Auditorium, 4700 Keele St. Special guest will be tenor Felix Livshitz, who is a soloist with the New Israeli Opera based in Tel Aviv.

The program, called Sounds of the Old City, will include a mixture of legendary Broadway and Hollywood hits, classical pieces and songs from the shtetl, as well as a salute to composers George Gershwin, Leonard Bernstein, Franz Kreizler, J. Bock and Charlie Chaplin, whose work as a composer is not as well known as his films.

The musicians will be led by arranger and violinist Alexander Povolotsky, of whom the IPO's director Zubin Mehta has said: "He has a great talent for arranging music of different instrumental combinations, epecially music of the lighter genre. His intimate knowledge of string instruments, being a wonderful violinist himself, gives him the advantage of bringing out quality that only a fine string player would know."

Povolotsky, whose daughter and son frequently play violin with him and the IPO, has recently recorded a CD of the trio's music, with works by Sarasate, Paganini, Wieniawski and Dvorak.

Legendary art collection from Weimar Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As part of the first Canadian-German festival from April 25 to June 1, the legendary Feldberg art collection will be exhibited here.

Consisting of self-portraits of mainly Jewish avant-garde artists, the Feldberg collection will be on display at the University of Toronto's Justina M. Barnicke Gallery at Hart House.

The self-portraits, from 1920s and 1930s Weimar Germany, are of such luminaries as Kathe Kollwitz, Max Liebermann, Josef Oppenheimer and Oskar Kokoschka.

Scorned by the Nazis, they belonged to a modernist movement known as the Berlin Secession, which opposed Germany's conservative aesthetics.

They were driven out of Germany by Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime.

The self-portraits were amassed by Siegbert Feldberg (1899-1971), a Jewish garment manufacturer from Stettin who enjoyed Berlin's rich cultural milieu.

A lawyer by training, he began to acquire the drawings, water colours and pastels in the early 1920s.

He and his wife Hildegard and their two sons left Germany in 1935 for India, bringing their collection of self-portraits with them.

The Feldbergs lived in India until the 1960s, after which they lived in Germany and Switzerland.

The Berlinische Galerie, Berlin's federal museum of modern art, bought the Feldberg collection of 130 works in 1976.

Like a time capsule, it preserves a long-gone era of Berlin art and cultural history.

Josef Oppenheimer.

The Toronto exhibition, the collection's first public showing anywhere, is in tribute of Hildegard Feldberg, who died in Canada in 1996.

Gallery hours at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery are 11 am to 7 pm from Monday to Friday and 1 to 4 pm on Saturday and Sunday.

The Canadian-German festival is presenting a vast array of events, from a photo exhibition and a political symposium to concerts and movies.

It is being presented by the Goethe Institut, Inter Nationes, the German National Tourist Office, the German Wine Information Bureau, York University, the University of Toronto and the German-Canadian Business and Professional Association.

Focus deals with intolerance, racism and anti-Semitism

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two new video releases recently crossed my desk. One is the fascinating drama Focus, based on playwright Arthur Miller's first published novel, and the other is the HBO telefilm, Conspiracy, which dramatizes the Wannsee Conference held by Hitler's henchmen in 1942 in order to determine the "final solution".

Focus is the more interesting film. It deals with intolerance, racism, anti-semitism and mistaken identity.

The story revolves around an ordinary man, Lawrence Newman (played by William H. Macy), who does not want to stand out from the crowd. He has a secure but boring job and his life has settled into a safe, uncomplicated mode.

Newman is prepared to continue with his rather unspectacular life until events overtake him.

Newman meets a sexy, outspoken woman (played by Laura Dern) and winds up marrying her. He also loses his job and finding a new one does not come easy.

The film is set during World War II in a quiet neighbourhood in Brooklyn. But Newman's neighbours aren't willing to live and let live.

When a Jewish store keeper allows his relatives from Eastern Europe to move in with him, the bigots in the area view this as an invasion of their turf and join an anti-Semitic group in order to keep the area free of Jews.

At first Newman refuses to get involved. But then his wife is attacked because people mistakenly think that he is Jewish. Only then does Newman decide to fight back.

Although the story is set in an era that is almost forgotten now, the film looks at a number of disturbing issues.

Macy and Dern turn in sparkling performances, with David Paymer and Meat Loaf providing solid support.

Laura Dern and William Macey in Focus, now on video and DVD.

Focus is now available on VHS and DVD in most video stores and was released by Paramount Home Entertainment.

Conspiracy features Kenneth Branagh and Stanley Tucci, who portray Reinhard Heydrich and Adolf Eichmann, the organizers of the meeting that set the guidelines for the destruction of European Jewry. This video is also now available in video stores and was released by HBO Home Video.

It makes for fascinating viewing, although a previous, superior film called Wannsee Conference, produced in German, and filmed in real time, has been available for a number of years. Unfortunately, it may be very difficult to find copies of Wannsee Conference, therefore most of us will have to be content with the recent release.

B'NAI BRITH ORGANIZES SOLIDARITY MISSION TO ISRAEL

Right now is the best time for Canadian Jews to show solidarity with the Jewish state by visiting Israel, says a B'nai Brith Canada official who is co-ordinating a Summer Solidarity Mission to Israel for June 9 to 15.

Jewish communities around the world have always come to each other's aid in times of distress, said Avie Esakov, who lived in Israel 37 years before coming to Canada last year.

"The community that needs the most help right now is Israel," he said. "In the Gemarah it says, 'Kol Yisrael aravim zeh la zeh' – all of Israel is responsible for one another."

B'nai Brith is promoting the solidarity mission with the phrase, "Stand Tall Against Terror."

Highlights of the proposed trip include discussions with senior government officials, briefings by high-ranking military officers, meetings with the families of victims of terror, an update and review of the situation along the northern border, and a strategic assessment of the situation along the Golan Heights.

"I don't recall a time since the War of Independence that the civilian population of Israel has felt so pressed," Esakov said. "This is the time to show our support. Instead of having Jewish organizations decide to go to Auschwitz and not to Jerusalem, I think it's time they decided to go to Jerusalem and not to Auschwitz."

Although B'nai Brith officials are optimistically expecting 50 to 100 people to join the mission, Esakov said he would like "several hundred people going to Israel because this is when Israel needs it the most." By mid-April some 25 people had expressed interest in the trip.

The Canadian government helped persuade many Canadians to visit New York to show solidarity after Sept. 11, he noted, so Jewish organizations in Canada should be working to get planeloads of Jewish visitors to Israel.

Families are welcome on the 6-day, 5-night trip. The cost of $1,799 per person includes flights, deluxe accommodation, transportation, guide and most meals. Participants are invited to stay on and attend the World Zionist Congress as VIP B'nai Brith representatives from June 17 to 21.

For more details or to register, contact Avie Esakov in Toronto, 416-633-6224, ext. 140. E-mail, aesakov@bnaibrith.ca. In Montreal, contact Saulie Zajdel, 514-733-5377, ext. 22. In Winnipeg, contact Alan Yusim, 204-487-9623.

Esakov is also helping to co-ordinate a special effort through which Canadians may work for one week as volunteers for hospitals, the Magen David ambulance service and the army.

El Al Update: For understandable reasons, tourism to Israel has been down sharply in recent months, yet El Al's service continues as always.

"The traffic originating in Canada is very small, but there are a lot of Israelis going out of the country to Canada, and via Toronto to Los Angeles," said Stanley Morais, the airline's director of sales and marketing in Canada.

"If we would be dependent only on traffic originating outside of Israel, we'd be looking at a very difficult situation now," he said. "But El Al has increased its market share among Israelis, and Israelis are one of the most well-travelled people in the world."

El Al Israel Airlines recently began utilizing the Boeing 777s, the newest aircraft in its fleet, for its thrice-weekly Canadian runs. The 777s carry 282 passengers and have a slightly larger capacity than the 767s that were previously in use.

Another recent development is that the airline recently gained permission to take on local passengers from Toronto to Los Angeles on the final leg of its Tel Aviv-Toronto-Los Angeles flights.

"It's a good alternative to Air Canada or American Airlines, and it gives the Jewish community another opportunity to support Israel by travelling El Al," Morais said.

"They get the service and they get good El Al security. That's very important nowadays. Security is still at the top of people's list of what people want when they fly, and El Al is still the leader of that."

Arab emirate welcomes observant Jewish liver specialist

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Dr. Gerald Minuk, one of Canada's leading liver specialists, received a royal welcome in the small Arab emirate of Qatar in Februrary.

Surprisingly, he said, the fact that he is an openly observant Jew didn't seem to faze anyone.

Minuk has been invited to many countries, including Israel, to share his expertise in treating liver disease, but his invitation to Qatar was the first invitation from an Arab country.

"There is a real problem with hepatitis C [in Qatar]," he said. "About 10 per cent of the population is infected, compared to one per cent of North Americans.

"I was invited to come to Qatar to review the problem and recommend treatment and prevention measures."

The Qataris had first proposed that he come in September, but that was not a good time because of the High Holy Days, said Minuk, who is an active member of the Ashkenazi Synagogue, Winnipeg's oldest Orthodox synagogue.

"I didn't hear back from them, so I assumed that since they knew I was Jewish, they didn't want me to come," he said.

In January, though, he received an e-mail from the Qatari minister of health with apologies for not responding sooner – due to Sept.11– and he asked Minuk to come in February.

"I asked Rabbi Avraham Altein – the Lubavitcher rebbe in Winnipeg and the spiritual leader of the Ashkenazi shul – if I should go," Minuk said.

"He told me that of course I should go, but that I should go as a proud Jew, that I shouldn't try to hide my identity."

Minuk said that many colleagues who had travelled in the Arab world advised him to change his passport because of the number of Israeli stamps in it. He didn't though, and it made no difference, he said.

"I was treated as a VIP as soon as I landed. I was met at the airport by a limousine and an entourage of half a dozen local dignitaries."

He was put up in the best hotel in the capital, Dubai (home of Al Jazeera television) and whisked everywhere in limousines.

In between examining patients and giving lectures to medical personnel, he was treated to a celebrity tennis match, watching from the royal box, and taken to visit a Bedouin tent.

"Everyone was very hospitable," he said.

"What surprised me the most was their views on Israel. The concensus seemed to be that the Qataris have no problem with Israelis. They believe that the conflict is between the leaders of the two sides, not the Israeli and Arab people."

Minuk noticed that twice a day, many of his colleagues would steal away for prayer so he let it be known that he also had to take a break to say his prayers.

"I found a window in the hospital complex where I could be clearly visible, put on my tefillin and prayed Shacharit every morning," he said.

"The hospital director told me I was probably the first Jew to pray openly in the country. They respect people who respect their own religion."

The Qatari government was so impressed with Minuk, he said, they offered him a full-time job in the country. "I politely declined."

Spring Sprint to raise funds for brain tumour research

BRAMPTON, Ont. — Every year 10,000 Canadians are diagnosed with brain tumours and every year, researchers get closer to finding a cure for the condition that affects not only the patient but everyone in that person's life.

On Sunday May 5, more than 1,000 people from across southern Ontario will don their walking shoes and head to scenic Professor's Lake, 1660 North Park Drive (East of Highway 410, near North Park Drive and Torbram Road), to participate in the David Bloom Memorial Spring Sprint, raising funds for the Brain Tumour Foundation of Canada (BTFC).

"The foundation means the world to us," sprint chairman Lawrie Bloom said. "After David passed away last year, we brought in record numbers and this year we're going to beat that amount."

The Brampton Sprint is held in honour of David Bloom, who passed away last April of an astrocytoma – an inoperable cancerous brain tumour – at only 19 years of age. He was diagnosed with the condition at 17.

As a singer, actor, dancer and straight-A student, David's presence, charisma, enthusiasm and zest for life touched thousands of people not just in his hometown of Brampton but across the country. From shows at Paramount Canada's Wonderland to the Charlottetown Festival's Somewhere in the World, David always wowed the crowds.

This year, Brampton will join nine other communities across Canada in holding a Spring Sprint. Brampton Mayor Susan Fennell will start the sprint and will be among the dignitaries at the event.

To date, the Brampton Sprint has already secured nearly $65,000 in corporate sponsorship – triple last year's pre-event tally – and is looking to beat last year's overall total of $120,000.

Pre-registration for the event is encouraged by obtaining a pledge-form package from the BTFC at 1-877-236-1927. All participants obtaining $30 or more in pledges will receive a 2002 Spring Sprint T-shirt.

Registration will begin at 9:30 a.m. the day of the event, with the sprint starting at 10:30 a.m. Participants will walk, run or wheel the 3 kilometres around Professor's Lake. Festivities will continue until about 1 p.m. with live entertainment, an awards presentation, a silent auction, a door-prize raffle and barbecue.

Ontario Golf Hall of Fame awaits 'true legend' Lightstone

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back in the early 1950s, Irv Lightstone embarked on a career path that could hardly be considered typical for a nice Jewish boy from Toronto.

Lightstone accepted a partial athletic scholarship to a California college to play golf, the country club sport of the American elite.

Hardly typical for the time, but even in 2002 there still aren't too many People of the Book lining up to enroll for a higher golf education at top tier U.S. colleges, let alone in the PGA's demanding "Q school."

But Lightstone loved the game from an early age. He was one of the few boys to receive a set of clubs for his bar mitzvah and when he left for San Francisco, he was a pretty good golfer looking to get better.

Fifty years later, after a long and varied career as a top amateur player and a club professional, Lightstone's accomplishments are being recognized. On May 8 at Wooden Sticks in Uxbridge, Ont., he will be inducted into the Ontario Golf Hall of Fame in recognition of his many contributions to the sport.

Described as a "true legend" by golf course architect Ron Garl, Lightstone has done just about everything in the golf world short of outscoring Tiger Woods.

He was elected president of the Canadian Professional Golf Association (CPGA), he has served as head professional of Maple Downs Golf Course for 46 years, he was head professional at the Doral Golf & Country Club in Miami, Fla., he was named Ontario Golf Professional of the Year in 1979 and Canadian Golf Professional of the Year in 1980. Lightstone played the PGA Tour in the early 1960s as well as several amateur circuits of the day.

Besides raising more than $1 million for the Easter Seals Society at an annual tournament at Maple Downs, he is perhaps best known for the mentoring he has provided 28 golf assistants who went on to become pros at clubs across Canada.

"I was with Irv for five years," said Jeanine Perse, head pro at Lake Joseph in Muskoka, in an interview with Globe and Mail golf columnist Lorne Rubenstein.

"He let you find your own way, and in doing that, you learned a lot. He was always there to help you move up and never felt threatened by his assistants. He encouraged us to go and get our own jobs."

Lightstone, 67, said he gets very emotional when he hears testimonials from his former associates.

"I don't think I've ever hurt anyone in my life. I've just tried to help people," he said. "I dealt with people on a high level, trained them and showed them how to play, how to deal with people on a human level."

Throughout his lengthy career, Lightstone has had the opportunity to rub shoulders with a host of golf legends, and plenty of celebrity amateurs who were legends in their own field of work.

Back in his university days, college golf was as popular in California as hockey is here. It was dominated by the likes of Ken Venturi, Tony Lema, Bob Rossburg, Billy Casper and Gene Littler.

The level of golf was high and he admits he learned a lot at the time. Even the public courses were set up to create champions. One of them, Harding Park in San Francisco, was a PGA Tour stop and yet only charged $1 a day to play. (It charges $26 (US) for a round today.)

When he returned to Canada after 1½ years, he joined the Ontario Amateur Tour, playing with Moe Norman, Gary Cowan and Nick Weslock, all Canadian hall of famers.

"I was ranked in the top 15 in Ontario," Lightstone recalled. "I just love it so much, that's all I wanted to do."

Known for his excellent wedge play and accurate putting, Lightstone said today's golfers have a tremendous length advantage over the golfers of the '50s. Using wooden clubs, 240-260-yard drives were large back then, never mind the 310-yard monster hits of today's top hitters. The balls today, in particular, are a lot better than the old balata balls, which did not fly as far and which were inconsistent in their flight path, he said.

Lightstone played in two Canadian Opens as an amateur, and five as a pro. From 1955-56, he travelled the Southern Amateur Circuit with Norman, whom he describes as "probably the best ballstriker I've ever seen."

Norman was known for his hard work, perseverance and dedication to the game, sometimes practicing so much his hands became too raw to grip the club.

"From him I picked up course management, cutting and hooking the ball," said Lightstone, who appeared in a recent TV documentary about Norman.

In 1956, Lightstone turned pro at Maple Downs, which at the time was not much more than a cow pasture with 18 holes.

While helping build the club into a prestigious venue that would go on to host top players like George Knudson, Al Balding, Nick Price, Lee Trevino and Curtis Strange, Lightstone pursued a second career in the United States.

From November to March in the early 1960s, when Maple Downs closed down, he played the PGA Tour. "I might've picked up small money," he said, teeing off against Arnold Palmer, Casper, Rossburg and Venturi.

A few years later, he got involved with a much more lucrative venture. He was hired by entrepreneur Alfred Kaskel to serve as head golf pro at Doral in Miami. One of his main tasks was wining and dining the stars who lived in or visited "Las Vegas West."

TV star Jackie Gleason was a regular at Doral, playing seven days a week. He lived in a lodge at the course and did his show from the Miami Auditorium. Gleason was king of the course and Kaskel had a special cart constructed for him, equipped with a TV set, a bar and a telephone hooked into the club's main switchboard.

Irv Lightstone to be inducted

The front of the car was emblazoned with, "How sweet it is," the back, "And away we go," two of Gleason's signature lines.

Gleason's buddy, Ed Sullivan, would fly down to Miami after his Sunday night TV show and spend three or four days playing the course with Gleason.

Other stars Lightstone met included Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin, Sammy Davis Jr. and Vic Damone. Of the bunch, Martin was the best golfer, usually shooting in the low 80s.

As time went on and Miami lost its luster, Lightstone concentrated on Maple Downs. The members poured money into the farmer's field and turned it into a top course.

"If the course was in the United States, it would become a national park," he said.

Lightstone has also served as golf consultant for numerous courses in Ontario, even one in Varedaro, Cuba.

Though he'll be retiring as head pro, Lightstone plans to keep busy. He will continue to serve as vice-president of marketing for a golf apparel company and he'll keep up his consulting work.

What's more, he plans to play four or five rounds a week and probably improve his game.

Not bad. Retire as a head pro and get to play more golf. The love affair with the game continues.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Every community has a prevalent culture and character that help to shape its identity. The Toronto Jewish community is a tight-knit group harbouring a huge love for Israel. Generally, we are not at the forefront of creative change and scholarship in the Jewish world, yet we are programmatically vibrant and communal in spirit. From the outside, Toronto is viewed as a great place to raise a family and actualize a Jewish life with little fear of anti-Semitism.

Like a person whose personality is crowded and composed of many qualities, however, our community also has certain foibles.

One of those blemishes is the quiet indifference and inactivity of so many of Toronto's Jews during crisis periods, a weakness magnified since the recent crisis in Israel.

Our Jewish community is made up of close to 200,000 people. Yet at a recent Israel rally held at Mel Lastman Square, only 2,000 individuals showed up. This month, following limited advertising, Aish Hatorah held a rally at Queen's Park, and 800 people were in attendance. Last year, approximately 250 Jews participated in a vigil voicing concern for the safety of Iranian Jews who had been arrested, and accused of spying for Israel – a capital offence.

Most Jewish organizational professionals will tell you that a well advertised rally will capture the attention of at best 5,000 people, many of whom are compassionate and vigorous elderly, motivated by their stark memories of signs on Lake Ontario beaches stating, "No dogs or Jews allowed."

So where are the Jews of Toronto? Why are we individuals – the strength of the Jewish collective – leaving a very difficult and courageous task up to a small percentage of our community's population (people frustrated and sad at their neighbours' intransigence to rise to the words of Eli Wiesel: to be Jewish is to care).

Why is it that Jewish communities in Paris, New York and Russia consistently attract thousands of local Jews to their rallies?

Our adversaries are aware of the tiny crowds we get at public expressions of concern. This serves to strengthen their position and motivation. Knowing this, where are the crowds?

The easiest response to this is that Jewish organizations are at fault, weak in their marketing machine and lacking passion in their plea. I believe that there is a certain truth to this; however, in our less-than-perfect community, organizations have generally created a magnificent infrastructure accessible to most Jewish members. E-marketing, posters and faxes advertising major events, are everywhere – enough so that Jews living in the Beaches, Brampton, Mississauga, let alone along the Bathurst corridor, can easily discover times, dates and venues.

Maimonides said, "It is wrong to consider personal danger when the public welfare is at stake." It is time for the entire population of 200,000 Jewish men, women and children in Toronto to be accountable, active participants in securing and maintaining the future and security of the children of Israel.

Buses are being blown up in Haifa, rabbis are being beaten up in Germany, and a shul in downtown Toronto was set ablaze. Be a warrior Jew. Stand up and fight! Don't leave the job up to a few burdened and courageous Jews.

A classic Chassidic quote states: The virtue of angels is that they cannot deteriorate; their flaw is that they cannot improve. Humanity's flaw is that we can deteriorate, but our virtue is that we can improve.

Let us all struggle to ensure that Toronto Jewry works together to be a powerful light unto other communities, and starting players in the fascinating and often perilous Jewish story.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My daughter Tracy attends university in the United States. She lives off campus with her fiancé Alan. They have been together for three years and have been cohabitating for two of those three years.

Here is my issue. Tracy and Alan are coming home for Alan's brother's bar mitzvah next week. I haven't seen Tracy for a long time and am very excited about catching up on all the news. Tracy expects to stay here with Alan – in one room. I am very uncomfortable with that.

I still have another, older teenage daughter at home and feel this would be sending a bad message to her. My husband says I need to lighten up or Tracy and Alan will stay at Alan's place where staying in one room is not an issue.

Do you think I'm out of line? Should I lighten up?

One Room or Two

Dear One Room or Two,

After consulting the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Sisterhood, I received the following possible solutions:

a) You shouldn't let them stay together as that goes against your principles and the rules in your home.

b) You do whatever you have to do to be with your daughter whom you have missed dearly and would do almost anything to be with.

c) Give them two separate rooms and turn a blind eye to what goes on in the night.

These are obviously different views, one of which may suit you best. My opinion tends to lean closest to (a). I believe that no one should ever be made uncomfortable in his or her own home, for any reason.

There is plenty of time to shmooze, talk and have dinners and lunches together, even if Tracy chooses not to sleep at home. But I think if you explain to her how you feel, without anger or judgement, she may respect your wishes and not want to disappoint you.

The fact that you have another teenager at home is a big factor as well. It would be hard for you to deny her request of staying in one room with her beau after you have allowed Tracy to do so. Stick to your gut feelings!
